

Adventure Awaits You in the Pages of

Short Stories

Read "Short Stories" for inviting, invigorating relaxation. In its thrill-packed pages you'll find a collection of novelettes, short stories and novel-length yarns of high adventure, vivid action, daring exploits . . . tales from every part of the world where men rub shoulders with the dangerous, from the great frontiers of the early West to the rolling, mysterious East—from the frozen North to languid, magnola-secented South!

Buy

Short Stories

Every Month—160 Pages—25c

A child must be guarded in its tender years against those who follow false gods down dim paths to ablivion

Stephen Grendon

LONG NOVELETTES

existing institution is

THE TERROR IN TEAKWOOD Harold Lawlor 53  What was the macabre secret of the black easket, more previous than life, more dangerous than death?
VENTURER OF THE MARTIAN MIMICS — Eric Frank Russell 79 Our young sciences, like our imaginings, have limits but where lacks and possibilities start—and they are truly boundless
SHORT STORIES
HOCDOOED Seabury Quinn 22  When the time comes to fix the hoodoo there is no power in housen or certif to evert if FLUFFY Theodore Sturgeon 37  Don't make enemies with a cat. Why? Well, try tt, and find out!
THE IMMORTAL LANCER  There are places in this world and out of it that you have never decarded of in your wildest nightnareas!  Allison V. Harding 43
SWEETS TO THE SWEET - Robert Bloch 73 She wanted a broomstick and a black cut, after all, don't switches have both 1
LIZZIE BORDEN TOOK AN AXE
VERSE
ON A WEIRD PLANET Stanton A. Coblentz 42

·3.50

This New Edition of WEBSTER'S

Postpaid

COLLEGIATE DICTIONARY

Created by the same Editorial Staff that recently completed the great new unabridged Merriam-Webster and abridged directly from that epochal work.

110,000 ENTRIES representing the most discriminating selection of useful words and helpful information on all subjects.

DEFINITIONS are authoritative, clear, easy to understand and presented with a wealth of illustrative examples.

PRONUNCIATION is given by the universally accepted Merriam-Webster system and backed by the unequalled Merriam-Webster authority.

DERIVIATIONS are recorded with accuracy and completeness unequalled by any other handy-size dictionary.

SYNONYMS are comprehensively treated to clarify all finer shades of meanings. Also lists of antonyms.

1.800 ILLUSTRATIONS accurately drawn to aid your understanding of complex subjects.

PRONOUNCING DICTIONARIES of GEOGRAPHY and BIOGRAPHY, comprising ancient and modern geographical names and famous men and women.

SPECIAL FEATURES OF PRAC-TICAL HEIPULINESS-Rules for Punctuation, Use of Capitals, Abbreviations Used in Writing and Printing, Foreign Words and Phrases, Arbitrary Signs and Symbols, List of American Colleges and Universities, Pronouncing Vocalulary of Christian Names, Vocalulary of Physmas, etc., offermation, briefly and clearly presented.

Fill out order form below and mail to The American News Company, Limited, 414 Wellington Street West, Toronto 2-th Ontant

Please send me Webster's Collegiate Dictionary at $3.50 postpaid.

I enclose herewith money order or cash to cover.

(Write your name and address below.)

Name		 		•••••	•••••
Addres	s	 	. .

Volumes From Arbham House S THIS issue of WEIRD TALES

goes to press we have on our desk four new books from Arkham House, These volumes are Henry S. Whitehead's "West India Lights," "The Clock Strikes Twelve," by H. R. Wakefield, "Fcarful Pleasures" by A. E. Coppard and A. E. Van Vogt's "Slan."

Some of the stories in these collections are new to us. All, we are sure, will interest us as they will fantasy enthusiasts and WEIRD TALES readers.

And we tip our hat (the one with the chin strap so it won't blow off in New York's winter winds!) to August Derleth, who of course, is Arkham House, for his kindness in shooting along these books as they are published by him, and for the fine job he is doing.

Incidentally, in this connection, we were referred to a not-so-long-ago N. Y. Times book section containing a review of the Whitehead book "West India Lights."

After mentioning WEIRD TALES as the source of most of the stories therein. the reviewer concludes as follows:

"One factor that 'West India Lights' points up is the oftime superirity of the succeed-at pulp magazines, where most of these tales were first published, over their haughty relations, the slicks?"

To which we reply, Amen, we knew it all the time!

The Long and Short of It

T ENGTHS we always have with us. We mean story lengths-not winter underwear - like short - short, short, medium, long and very long. The primary function of WEIRD TALES is, of course, to bring entertainment to its readers. If we can please most of our readers most of the time and just about all of them some of the time, then we've done our job. If we fail, well, you let us know about it quick enough!

One of our thought-provokers has been the question of aforementioned length. We get letters saying, in effect, "Give us more of those very short two or three pages with the punch at the end -that way we get more stories per icense "

Then we get other messages urging that we "cut out the short stuff, give us longer, even if fewer stories, per issuc." After all, even an editor knows that a magazine contains just so many pages, and try as you may you can't stretch 'em. So we seek that elusive thing called balance. A little of the short, some of the medium and some of the long, Usually, that is!

(Continued on Page 72)

Mr. George

BY STEPHEN GRENDON'

Some said the house was haunted but was it not, rather, the lives in that dwelling that were haunted?

NOW that the antight of his aftermon shared caree the laws, ferrigathered and tied a little blue rightgathered and tied a little blue rightgathered and tied a little blue rightgathered and tied a little blue rightmon. She opened it. Voices came up the stairs. But they were out in lock,
and would not hear her leaving the blue.

and would not hear her leaving the blue.

being on the stairs of the stairs of the stairs of the stairs of the stairs of the stairs of the stairs of the stairs of the stairs to the front door and outside.

The street-car conductor recognized her. He bent his mustached face above her and asked. "All alone, Miss Priscilla?"

"Yes, sir."

"It's going on for dark, too. Are you off far?"
"Oh, no. I'm going to see Mr.

George."

He looked unhappy. His smile was pale, thin. He said no more. The street car clanged on its way.

"Through a regrettable error, this story is announced on our cover as by August Derleth. Mr. Derleth acted as agent for Mr. Grendon's story, and someone in our office confused the agent's name for the author's. The error was discovered too late to stop printing of the cover.

Priscilla knew that the conductor would till be right where to get off, but just the same she counted the blocks—the most but one, where Renshaws lived; the house after that, which was Burton's; the one after that, which was Burton's; the cone of vacant lost; and then at last, after three blocks in which no one she knew three blocks in which no one she knew the blocks in the blocks in which no one she knew the blocks in the blocks in which no one she knew the blocks in which no one she knew the blocks in which have been blocked between the blocks in the blocks.

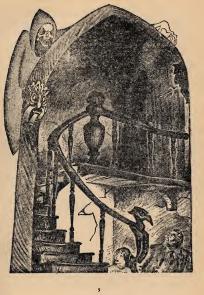

"Yes, sir. I know. Thank you," she said.

She smiled at him and got off.

He looked after her, troubled; he shock his head. "And what's to become of her with all those vultures around her?" he asked of the mote-ridden air.

All along the way, Priscilla had been a little apprehensive about the big iron gate; but, since it was not yet six o'clock, it stood open. She passed through the open gate and went directly to Mr. George's place. There was nothing to out the flowers in; so she left them there, right where Mr. George would be sure to see them. She was not quite sure about Mr. George. Of late, many things had puzzled her. She did not understand about Mr. George, nor why he had gone away and left her alone with her mother's cousins, who, she knew with the unerring instinct of a child, did not love her the way Mr. George had loved her, or her mother before him, gone too.

She pulled out the note and fixed it in such a way that he would be sure to see it. Going away, she looked back several times to see whether he had come; but the flowers lay here undisturbed with the whiteness of the note-paper standing out. The flowers were sweet rockst, for-get-me-nots, and roses—odd-fashinode flowers, the kind Mr. George liked. But Mr. George did not come, he was not in sight when she got to the gate; so, with one last, lingering look, also went out into the street and down to the corner to wait for the street-car, already beginning to wonder whether they had missed her.

But, no, they had not. They were still ultime powen he slipped throe becomes tabling when he slipped throe becomes though one of them was in the disingtoom now, and they were all raking their volces a little—not enough to be audited under beyond the front hall. She stood sounders, littening. Though the two womens and the man, their brother, were her mother's cousins, Priestilla thought of them as her aunts and under. The women were in the littlehen, and Uncle Laban in the dising-room.

UNCLE LABAN was saying, "The trouble with you, Virginia, is that you have no sinse of refinement, no tact. It's just the money you want, and you don't eare how you get it."

"It's just her who stands between us. You know it as well as I."

You know it as well as I."

"Now that George is gone," said

Laban.
"Yes," said Virginia.

There was a nervous titter from Ade-

"I often wonder just what was the relation between them," resumed Virginia, "Were they lovers?"

"It doesn't matter."

"Oh, it does," put in Addie. "If we could prove perhaps that she is his could prove perhaps that she is his child..."

Laban made an impatient, clucking sound. "Irrelevant and immaterial. Cissie"s will is clear and it makes no difference whether Priscilli as George's or Henry's or even whether she wasn't Cissie's. The will set forth that George was to stay here in Cissie's house until he wished to go—"

"Or died," interposed Virginia.
"Don't be unpleasant," said Laban shortly. "And the house, the grounds, and all the money-"

"Three hundred thousand dollars!" sighed Adelaide,

"Belongs to Priseilla."

"You leave out the most important part," said Virgina, "After Priscilla, we come."

"Say rather, we are here."

"Oh, yes," said Adelaide bitterly, as we have always been here. On someone's bounty,"

"What do you care about that?" asked

Laban pettishly. "We have the run of the house—and almost of her bank account."

"I want it county above board," and

"I want it openly, above-board," said Virginia,

"Oh, you are descending to comedy," said Laban. "But I know you're up to something—letting the servants go one by one."
"They were Gissie's—not mine."

"You haven't replaced any of them."

"No. I'll think about that. Have you got that table done?"

"Yes."
"Go and call her."

Priscilla fled noiselessly up the stairs, so that she would be ready when Uncle so that she would be ready when Uncle Laban called.

On the night side of dusk, Canby, who was on his beat, saw something white fluttering beyond the gate. In the course of routine duty he went in to see what it was. He detached the note, flashed his light around to get such details as might be necessary, and in due course turned the note in at precinct headquarters. The captain read it.

"Dear Mr. George, please come back.

We want you to live with us again. We have plenty of room. You just take the street car and go straight east. The house is just like you left it, only now more roses are in bloom."

"No signature?"

"None. It was just there on the grave, with some flowers. I left the flowers. Grave of a man named George Newell. Died about a month ago. Fiftyone years old."

"Looks like a kid's handwriting. Give it to Orlo Ward—that's the kind of thing he wants for The New Yorker."

THE old clock in the hall, which had been grandfather Dedman's, talked all night. Mr. George said that her matter remarkers remarked how it talked mother remembered how it talked. It used to say, "Cis-sic, Cis-sic, Cissie, Go-to-sleep-now, Cis-sie!" over and own until she went to sleep New Priscilla thought it talked to her in the same way. But Priscilla was not sleepy. She lay listening to all the sounds the old house made. She lay mourning her lot, now that the cook-the last one she liked-bad been sent away, and the rest of them in the house disliking her. She could tell by the way they looked at her, by the way they talked to her; and there was the feeling she had. If only Mr. George would come back! Nothing had been the way it had always been after her mother went away since the day Mr. George complained he wasn't feeling well and later called her to his bed and said, "Be a good girl now, Priscilla. And remember, if anything goes wrong, go to Laura."-Laura being something to Mr. George as she had been to her mother, But not, like the Lecketts, blood-relative.

The murmur of voices whispered down the hall. Virginia Leckett was braiding her hair in her brother's room. Laban was already abed.

"And if something did happen to her, there couldn't be any question about our inheriting, could there?" she was asking. "That's the tenth time you've asked

"That's the tenth time you've aske that, I'll swear," he said. "Could there?" the invisted

"Could there?" she insisted.
"How? There aren't any other relatives."

"That's what I thought."

"That's what I thought."

"Anyway, she's as healthy as a cow."

"Anyway, she's as healthy as a cow."

"Oh, things could happen."

"What things?"
"You never can tell, Laban."

"You give me the creeps, Virginia."

"Look at the way George went."
"Well, you can't expect Priscilla to develop heart trouble."

"That's what the doctor said."

"That's what he dector said."

"That's what he believed, also."

"That could be seen to. There are things that bring on heart attacks." "You'd better not talk that way, Virginia."

"No?"

"No!"

"Just the same," she went on, talking more rapidly, "if something happened to Priscilla — just think, three hundred thousand dollars! Laban—think what you could do with your share! And I! Why, I could go to Eurone."

"But you never would. Why don't you stop torturing yourself about that money? It's out of your reach."
"Is it?"

"You'd better go to your room."

Virginia's footsteps went down the room. Don't let her come in, God, asked Priscilla with supreme confidence. Virvinia went on down the hall, and the hum of voices came distantly from Adelaide's room. It had been this way many nights since Mr. George went away. Sometimes Priscilla would think that she hated Aunt Virginia the most, but then she would remember mama telling her never to hate anyone because hate hurts the bater more than the bated-or something like that. Just the same, Priscilla did not trust Aunt Virginia. She did not trust Aunt Adelaide or Uncle Laban. either, but she distrusted Aunt Virginia the most. She could not understand what mama meant when she used to say to Mr. George, "I pity them. They are so narrow, so provincial. When they had money they could have gone to Paris, to Vienna-but no, they had to invest it in shaky stock just to get more, and lost it all. Poor things!"

The clock said, "Pris-sie, Pris-sie, Pris-sie. Go-to-sleep-now, Prissie."

"I'm not sleepy," said Priscilla into the darkness.

The house settled, groaning and creaking. A faucet dripped somewhere, and in the wind outside a limb of the cedar at the northwest corner of the house rapped from time to time against the wall. The clock went on talking, with its loud tick-tock, tick-tock, tick-tock. And outside the street cars clanged past, ever fewer and fewer of them, as the night deepened. Priscilla lay thinking. dreaming almost, of mama and Mr. George, and of how it had been only a year ago, when they had been where the ocean was, and she had played all day long in the sand, while mama's cough got worst and worse, and Mr. George grew sad and quiet, and the wind blew, it seemed, colder and colder and blew them one came in through the door and bent over her and whispered. "Go to sleep now, Priscilla."

"All right, Mr. George," she said.

IN THE morning Priscilla, who was up with the sun, took Celine-the oldest of her dolls, and her favorite, for it had come from Arles, bought by mama and Mr. George on a lovely holiday from Paris-and went to play in the tea house at the end of the garden, sitting in the cool shade of the birch trees leaning over. Long before anyone else in the house was out of bed, Priscilla reached her haven with Celine. She was in the habit of carrying on long conversations with Celine, who was pert and quaint at the same time, looking foreign and strange, and, in the circumstances, not too voluble, always saying just the right things.

This morning she was set up in the usual place across from Pricilla, and Priscilla arranged the tea-things as the Priscilla arranged the tea-things as the rest, or were her legs crossed under her again? Would Cellen like sugar or lemon again? Would Cellen like sugar or lemon to drink it in the proper manner, without anything? The birds same, for the three-girt garden was a haven in the midst of the city, and seven blocks was a good flying distance to the trees of the center; so they flew back and forth all day long, and made intimate noises in the shrubbery around the tea house.

Celine made the appropriate answers.

Celine made the appropriate answers.

But there was something strange about her this morning, and presently Priscilla began to look at her as if with new eyes. It seemed to her that Celine was trying very hard to say something to her—something really original, that dil not come from Priscilla first. "Take care," she seemed to say. "Watch out."

Priscilla looked around her in momentary alarm, so real did Celine's voice seem, But there was no one there.

"Watch out for whom?" she asked in a whisper.

"For them!" said Celine. But what an odd voice for a doll's, thought Priscilla.

Then she looked very covertly around her on all sides of the tea house. She knew that voice! She did, indeed, It was Mr. George's -and it was just like him to pretend it was Celine's.

She clapped her hands and cried out gaily, "Come out, come out, wherever you are. Mr. George."

No one came.

"Please, Mr. George."

A mourning dove-coold.

"Don't tease me."

to every part of the garden.

No answer.

She looked at Celine, but the doll was as bland as ever. She looked away, over her shoulder.

"Watch out," said Celine in Mr.

George's voice.

She whirled, looking this way and that.
"I'll find you," she cried out. "I will, I will!" She darted into the bushes, peering this way and that, with such violence that the birds were still, save for a bluejay who sent out warning cries about her intrusion the 46WHATEVER is that child doing?"

inquired Adelaide from the window. "What?" asked Virginia, hooking herself into her old-fashioned dress before the mirror.

"Why, running around and around the tea house. She seems to be looking for something. Or someone."

"Children have imaginary playmates."
"It's crazy, Ginny. Now, I wonder!"

"It's crazy, Ginny. Now, I wonder!"
Virginia looked at her. Sometimes that produced an idea of merit, from Virginia's point of view. "What is it now, Addie?"

Adelaide looked at her out of narrowed eyes.

"Do you suppose it might be possible to have her declared—well, not insane.

to have her declared—well, not insane, exactly—but . . ."

"Oh, no, that would never do. There are so many other ways. A slow poison, for instance."

"Don't be crude, Virginia," said Leban from the threshold. "For God's sake, are we going to have breakfast? If you insist on firing the cook, somebody in this household ought to be ready to assume kitchen resnonsibilities."

"We're coming," said Virginia, "Do see what Priscilla's doing." Laban crossed to the window and looked out.

After a while he said, "She appears to be holding a conversation."

"Oh, yes, with the doll. I've noticed that," said Virginia.

"No, not with the doll."

'crude.' Laban."

"Not? Is she alone?"
"Yes. Her back's to the doll; she's not even looking at it."

Virginia turned. "Adelaide, will you go out and call her in for breakfast."
And, when Adelaide had gone, she said to Laban. "I don't like to be called

He shrugged. He had been thinking about what he might inherit if anything idd happen to Priscilla; Virginia had planted seed in fertile ground. "Don't be them," he said. "What de you supper people would think if a face did like that? After all, the terms of Cissie's will aren't a dead secret. There would be questions. Finally, poison can be traced—even the most obscure poison, which you wouldn't get hold of, anyway."

10

"If you can think of anything better, why don't you?"

"It would have to be an accident or some kind-or at least, look like one. Only the other day I read something in the Saw about an accident which took the actic, looking themselves into a trust. They were sufficiented. That could as easily lappen, you know. How could anyone prove differently? But poison involves certain chemical and physiological factors which are increasible of long mode to tell a story different from the Addehide came lack, a little breath-Adelaide came back, a little breathless. "Imaginary playmates, is it? She says George is out there somewhere, hiding from her. She says he talked to her."

Virginia smiled, "That is putting her innermost wish into fantasy she can live. It's the height of imagination. What did he say?"

"She didn't tell me."
"Is she in?"

"She's coming."

"We shall sec."

PRISCILLA came in and sat down at the table. It was not set. She waited, looking at the three of them—Unde Laban, fat, jolly-looking except for his soft, full mouth and his small dark eyes; Aunt Adelaide with her grotesquely fat head, so leavy that it always lolled a little; Aunt Virginia with her thin line of mouth and her hard blue eyes. All were dressed in blade—Adelaide in taffeta. Virginia in broadcloth. All were now busy in some fashion or other—Lalan with the morning paper, Adelaide scurrying about to set the table, Virginia at getting breakfast.

It was hard for Peicella to sit still, because also was convinced that M. George had slipped into the house with George had slipped into the house with the rand was even more cancelled somewhere in the room. Her yess darted in positively this way and that, momentarily sibe expected him to reveal himmost. But molting happened, and meanwhite Adelside had brought all the dishes and then at last came with Virginia bearing eggs and basen and tosts, and a glass of milk for Pivicilla. All set down, Jahan putting his paper aids "With wisons were you talking in the "With wisons were you talking aid.

tea house, Priscilla?" asked Virginia.

"With Celine," answered Priscilla around her glass of milk, which she had begun to drink.

"Who else?" asked Laban.

No answer.
"I asked you, who else?"

Priscilla shook her head.
"You told me," said Adelaide.

"Mr. George," said Priscilla.

"Indeed! And what did he say?" asked

"Indeed! And what did he say?" asked Virginia.

Priscilla shook her head again. "Answer me."

Priscilla remained silent.

Virginia turned to the others. "You see, it's imagination."

"He came back last night. I asked him to," said Priscilla.

Adelaide tittered, Virginia flashed her a quick, angry glance. Laban hawked and bent to his bacon and eggs. THERE were no more questions. Each of them was thinking his own thoughts, Priscilla still hoped secretly for Mr. George to pop up and surprise them all. Adelaide thought of the way in which children played by themselves, Virginia contemplated the three of them alone in the house-their house-without Priscilla. Laban thought there was no good in delaying matters; accidents did not wait upon auspicious moments, Besides, the concept of a hundred thousand dollars which might be his to do with as he liked had grown immeasurably and now loomed directly before his mind's eve as a vast mountain of epitomized freedom, opening the world to him as it had never been open before. Finishing his breakfast, he gazed at Priscilla, who had also finished, and smiled. "Where did George go?" he asked. She was disarmed, "I think he's hid-

"I'll bet I know where he's hiding." continued Laban, "Should we go and look?" "Oh, yes, let's."

Laban pushed his chair away and got up. "Come along, then." "Excuse me," said Priscilla to the two women. They went out into the hall, Priscilla clinging to his hand. "I know just where he would be," said Laban, leading the way to the stairs.

"Unstairs?" "In the attic. It's dark there."

the end of which loomed the partly filled

THE dimness of the attic resolved itself for Laban into a giant funnel at the attic stairs. He began to circle the outer care of the funnel, moving things and looking behind them. Priscilla darted here and there, but every few moments she stood quite still and asked questioningly of the musty twilight, "Mr. George?" "We'll find him," said Laban each time, with a nervous heartiness. His hands were clammy, and cold sweat started to his forehead as he drew nearer and nearer to the trunk. The trunk was large and very heavy: once inside, it would be quite impossible hasp were not caught. All the darkness of the attic, which was large and reached into the gables of the old house, seemed to converge upon the trunk, Twice Priscilla stopped almost beside it. "He isn't here," said Priscilla at last, for Priscilla to lift the lid, even if the

"I'll bet he is." said Laban. "There's one more place just big enough to hide him. Right there."

He bent and lifted the heavy lid. The trunk was almost as deep as Priscilla was tall, though the things still packed in it diminished its depth a little. He looked at the child from the corners of his eyes: she seemed entranced, standing almost on tip-toe to peer toward the dark maw of the trunk "That's too dark for me to see him even if he is there," said Laban, "Maybe he's hidden under the clothes. Crawl in and find him, Pris."

Priscilla took two steps forward and heard someone say, "No. Priscilla,"

"Oh!" she exclaimed, clasping her hands. "It's Mr. George!"

"What?" Laban was startled.

"He's here somewhere. I heard him." Laban gazed at her with amazed wonder at the vividuess of her imagination. Then he said, "I'll bet he's hidden under this clothing. Just crawl in and surprise this clothing. Just crawl in and surprise him, Pris."

12

She shook her head. "Mr. George says not to."

A kind of exasperation was growing in him. He came down to his knees beside the trunk. "See," he said, "T'll prop up the lid." He pushed a heavy book upright between the lid and the trunk. "I'll be right here in case he comes out."

Priscilla shook her head. "You look," she said.

He thought quickly. If she could be persuaded to stand beside him, it would be simple to tip her into the truth without any kind of rough handling which might later show a bruise on the delicate flesh.

"Come and help me," he said, bending to peer into the darkness.

to peer into the darkness.

Priscilla came forward.

Just short of him something stopped her, something like an invisible hand pressing her back.

Something tall and dark took shadowy shape beside Laban where he knelt, waiting for her, something that reached down and tore the sustaining book from beneath the trunk-lid, something that pushed the trunk-lid down with weighty impact upon Laban Leckett's neck.

He gave a choking cry, humped up horrible, and collapsed, kicking a little.

"Go away, Priscilla. Go downstairs

"Yes, Mr. George."

Priscilla went obediently out of the attie, down the stairs, and back to the tea-house, where she sat and told Celine all about it, very animated.

At the window stood Virginia, looking out with narrowed eyes and a derisive smile on her face. "I knew it," she said over her shoulder to Adelaide. "There never was much man about Laban. He lost his nerve."

ON THE day after the funeral, James Craig came to call. Like the Leckett women, Jaura Craig was in her fiftigs, but hat belocket considerably younger. She dressed well, having money and knowing how to use it; knowing it was only a means to an end, not an end in itself. She had been a beautiful woman, and was still a artifulpy handsome one; in appearance there was the difference of day perment the control of the control of

"I was shocked to read about Laban," she said without preemble. "I read it only this morning. I've been up in Connecticut, and I am sorry to have missed the services. However did such a thing happen?"

"The lid of the trunk was very heavy," said Virginia, quick to speak before Adelaide could say anything. "I suppose Laban was careless."

"How dreadful?" exclaimed Laura. "But what was he looking for?"

'But what was he looking for?"

Virginia shrugged, and raised her evebrows.

"Something of father's, we think," said Adelaide. "That was father's trunk, you know. The last time it was used was when father went to the Exposition in St. Louis."

"It was only by accident that we found him," added Virginia. "We just missed him finally, and went to look for him. He had been dead quite a while. It was awful—the trunk-lid cause down with such force that it almost severed his head. We have destroyed the trunk, naturally."

"I should think so," 'said Laura.

THE talk drifted politely toward Priscilla, and presently Priscilla herself was walking down to the front gate with Laura Craig, whom she also called "Aunt." The sisters Leckett stood behind the curtains at the windows to make sure that Priscilla did not linger too long with this woman, whom they knew had come primarily to assure herself that the child was all right.

"Let us hope she says nothing of her absurd fancies to her," said Virginia bitterly.

"You forbade her to speak of them again."

"Oh, I know—but children recognize no restrictions. Will she ever forget George Newell? I wonder."

"It won't make any difference, will it?" Adelaide tittered.

"Be still, Adelaide." She sighed.
"What could have happened up there?

Laban was never eareless!"

"You know what she said."

"Oh. Addie! A farago of shadows and George and nonsense! Are you thinking the house is haunted by George? How laughable!"

window.

"It can't be denied, however, that Laban's death leaves each of us richer by fifty thousand dollars—after Priscilla, that is."

"How can you say such a thing, Addie!" said Virginia sharply.

Adelaide turned. "How can I say

Adelaide turned. "How can I s what?"

"What you just said about Laban's death."

"I didn't say anything about Laban's death." Virginia turned angrily. "Why, Addie! I heard you. Don't try to deny it."

"Are you out of your mind, Ginny?
I haven't opened my mouth. What did you imagine you heard now?"

"You said we would each be richer by fifty thousand dollars as a result of Laban's death."

"Why, I never!"

"You did!"

ou did!

"I did not! That, if anything, is a thought which would occur to you a long time before I would think of it." Thoughtfully, she added, "It's true, though, isn't it?" Virginia said nothing. Something guared previously at her conciousness, it was the knowledge that if something were to happen to Adelaide before Priscilled, she, Virginia, would come into the tree hundred thousant dollars, without the need of slarring at with anyone at all. A filled shaders, he forget about Priscilla and Laura Craig out in the afternoons saw at the gets and came away from the window. She was caught in a mesh of greed and conflicting desires.

THE ecdar limb tapped against the house once every five times the old clock in the hall said tick-tock Priscilla counted in the dark, and communicated her findings to Celine, whom she had permitted to share her bed that night. She set herself next to counting the times the faucet dripped. But this, she found, was next to impossible, for the drippings were never certain or clear. And there were other sounds alive in the dark in the old house. The attie shutter was loose, it creaked and banged in the wind. Something rustled down the hall, and Priscilla knew it was Aunt Adelaide again; in a few moments their voices made a nurmuring sound which joined the voices of the night. In her sister's room, Adelaide walked

In her sister's room, Adelaide walked nervously beside the bed. "It's no use your telling me it's my imagination, Virginia. I know I saw something. This is the third time, and I never heard that hallucinations "And what was it this time? Try to be coherent, Addic."

"A shadow in the hall, at the head of the stairs"

"If you weren't so vain about your eyes, I think an occulist and a pair of spectacles would lay your shadow."

"I stood still. The shadow moved, It was a man." Her words came faster. "Do you think I wanted to see him? Do you? Because if you do, you're crazy! I want to get out of this house. I hate it! I've hated it all my life-since we had to come and live here as Cissie's guests." "So do I. Just be patient, Addie. It takes time"

come in threes."

"Yes, always waiting!" She turned and bent over Virginia, instinctively lowering her voice. "I've thought of something, You know what Laban said about accidents. I've watched her swing. That is an awfully heavy swing, and when George made it for her he reinforced the oak seat with iron. If she should jump too soon and not get out of the way quickly enough -and if it should eatch her somehow .... I think it could bappen."

"Or be made to happen," added Virginia softly. "Think of that now, Addie, instead of absurd hallucinations. And for heaven's sake, don't tell anyone you think you see men on the stairs-you know what people would think!" Grandfather Dedran's clock said, "Prissie, Pris-sie, Prsi-sie, Go-to-sleep-now, Prissie." This time the cedar limb tapped on "sleep." Priscilla snuggled deeper into her bed and turned to Celine.

"Are you sleepy, Celine?" she asked. Celine oblingly indicated that she was not. Aunt Adelaide rustled back down the hall to her own 100m. Priscilla knew that her aunts had things to say to each other they did not want her to hear. She wondered sometimes what it might be they talked about, but she did not mind their ignoring her. No more did she care to have them listen to her conversations with Celine Or with Mr. George.

She raised up on her elbows and peered into the darkness of the room. Little light came in from outside; the close-pressing trees shut away all but two small rays of the street lights; one of these struck the opposite wall near the door, the other hit the mirror, where it reflected like a dim opening to a remote world of day,

"Mr. George, are you there?" she whispered into the darkness.

"Yes, Priscilla."

The answer came, it seemed, from all around her and from inside her at the same time. She did not question it.

"Please come where I can see you."

A part of the darkness near the door detached itself and drifted toward her bed: it crossed the light but did not sout it away from the mirror or the door, it left no shadow because it was itself a shadow. It hovered over the bed, and settled down to one side of it, sitting there. It was not strange to Priscilla. She was comforted.

"Say good night to Mr. George, Celine," she said.

CLAD in her negligee, Laura Craig wrote to George Newell's brother in London, the hour being late and everything still, save for the hum of life in the city, the vast subterrane roar, muted by night, the susurration of millions of creatures moving inexorably from birth to death like the sound of earth's turning. She wrote swiftly. The words came easily, for they had been pent up so long.

". . . I think there is no question but that Priscilla is George's child. She has his look about her eyes; that was not so noticeable a short time ago, but now it is coming out. And she is constantly obsessed with him, I do not know that that is good. Surely George would not think so if he were still alive, though he was absolutely devoted to her, as you know: so many of us thought that was because of Cissie and her slow dving. What is important. I think, is that some way ought to be found to take Priscella away from the Lecketts. They are definitely nineteenth-century, and they have that kind of repressive way of life which is acutely more wicked and evil than sheer wantonness. I mean that they certainly always recented being pitied by Cissie and even her goodness, which they never deserved. They are not good for Priscilla, though I found her remarkably self-contained, which is probably because she is left alone so very much. That is not good, either, I think you will agree. She has found time to think up the strangest fancies. For instance she believes that George is still in the house, She says that George pushed the trunklid down on Labon's neck. That is absurd. of course; it is the wildest of fanciesbut from all I have heard the lid did more damage to Laban's neek than it ought to have done, if it fell under its own power. There is something very strange about all this, and it will come as no surprise to you to learn that I have begun to wonder a little about George's death, too. After all, his heart wasn't that bad. I saw him only three days before he died and he said then that his condition seemed somewhat improved by sedentary living. I have to admit that my impression of the Lecketts is of the worst -I think they are selfish, greedy, lazy, and evil people, who behind their old-fashioned respectability, are capable of absolutely anything . . ."

THE summer deepened, and as it grew more sultry. Priscilla spent still more of her time in the yard. Her routine in the morning was unvaried. She went to the tea-house before breakfast, and returned to it afterward. Sometimes she received little notes and presents from Laura Craig, after which she was plagued by questions from Aunt Virginia and Aunt Adelaide. Priscilla could not know that the women were anxious to learn whether she had told Laura Craig anything; Priscilla, failing to understand the real goals of their innocuous questions, did not say. She fenced with them unconsciously, thwarting them, Though she did not understand, she was conscious of a feeling of dislike for her in them; but this did not trouble her; as long as they inflicted no punishment beyond the meanness of their words or actions upon her. In the afternoon she worked in her own little garden, which the women had allowed her to keep in one corner. And later, she retreated to the heavily shaded portion of the walled lawn where the swing hung from the limb of an ancient oak tree. She could swing for hours; from the top of the arc she made, she could look out into the street and once in a while she could see the street-car going by. Swinging gave her a sense of wild freedom; swinging made her feel that she had escaped the house and the women, that she was back in a world of green trees and sun and sky and birds, like that lovely lost time in Paris and Sorrento and on the beaches of Florida, when they had all three still been together-mania and Mr. George and she. She never tired of pumping with her sturdy little legs until she was high enough to see, and she was glad that no one ever told her to stop. Once in a while, too, Aunt Adelaide had come out to push her, which was even better. That August afternoon Aunt Adelaide came out again.

"Today I will jump from higher yet," said Priscilla.

She had learned, under Aunt Adelaide's urging, how much fun it was to leap from the careening swing, to fly through the air, as it were, under her own power.

Aunt Adelaide smiled.

It was a day of clouds, with rain impending. The birds were still, and Celine sat sedately forgotten in the tea-house. There was no wind, and the ook leaves drooped with wonderful pungence over that corner of the lawn, shutting out most of the sky, protecting them from the curious eyes of neighbors.

"I will jump from so high," said

Priscilla.

"No, that's too high." "I can do it, Aunt Adelaide."

"No, Priscilla, that is too high, You might break a leg or something. Tust think, six feet." Priscilla was insistent. "I can so jump from that high." "No," said Aunt Adelaide shortly.

"You may jump only from so high," "But I jumped from that high the last time." "Just the same, that's high enough,"

A DELAIDE had calculated very carefully. Priscilla jumped in a kind of crouch; then she straightened up and began to run back to get into the swing again. If she were halted at just the right place in that run back, and her attention distracted, the swing would catch her on the back of the head with deadly force. Because Priscilla reminded her of Circle, whom she had always envied as a girl because of her beauty, so much in contrast to Adelaide's over-sized head, Adelaide hated Priscilla. It seemed to her the most important thing in the world to do something to that lovely little head, because somehow she would be doing something to that even lovelier head which had been Cissie's, obscurely she would achieve a kind of compensation for the abnormality of her own, It was far more important than the money which meant so much to Virginia.

"At least, to begin with, that's high enough," amended Aunt Adelaide,

"I will jump later, then."

"We shall see. Come, get in."

Priscilla climbed into the swing and Adelaide began to push her slowly, steadily. The swing's are increased. Now Priscilla could see level with the top of the wall; now she could see over: now she was well up in the hot August air, almost brushing the leaves, taking deep breaths of the oak's perfume each time she came up under the leaves. And the street-car was coming, clang-clang at the corner, and up toward the house: she would see it from both ends of the arc. She aiways hoped that the conductor would see her so that she could wave to him; but he never did. The limbs and the leaves were too thick, and he never looked up much from the tracks.

Adelaide stopped pushing her and stepned back a little.

"Stay sitting now," she said. "I am," said Priscilla.

The swing began to slow down, the arc to diminish. She came down from the leafy sky, she came down out of heaven each time a little more. She came away from a newer singing up in the oak tree, back toward Aunt Adelaide she had jumped. "I'm going to jump now."

waiting to catch the swing as soon as

"Not yet." She waited a moment.

"Now, then."

"Not vet." She waited another of the diminishing arcs. "Now," she said, and jumped, throwing up her arms like a bird, and like a white bird flying to the ground, coming down in a supple crouch and bounding to her feet.

"Oh, fun!" she cried and turned to run to Aunt Adelaide, who stood with the swing held high over her head.

"Oh, look-a redbird!" cried Aunt Adelaide, pointing toward the wall.

Priscilla stopped and turned quickly.

With all her strength, Adelaide pushed the heavy swing. The curve was right: it would catch Priscilla on the back of the head just past the lowest point of the arc; it would crush and mangle forever that lovely head which was so like Cissie's, that head so lovely in contrast to her own. She took three steps forward, the simulated cry of horror already rising in her throat . . . and faltered. The swing stopped short of Priscilla's head. Caught in a dark, gangling shadow that seemed to depend from the tree. the swing went swiftly up and vanished into the oak. Then it came hurtling down with incredible force, clear of Priscilla, straight at Adelaide. Fear rooted her there directly in its path. The heavy, iron-reinforced board struck her across the temple; she dropped without a sound, while the child still looked in Priscilla turned and saw the woman crumpled there. "Aunt Adelaide!" she cried. Annt Virginia came running from the house, crying, "Addie! Addie!" "Go to your room, Priscilla."

THE voice came in the whisper of the and leaves, where a wind was starting up; it rose out of the shadowed heart of the tree and descended all about her like a cloak, as if to shut away the mangled head and the blood there, and the sight of Aunt Virginia like a mad woman coming to her knees beside Adelaide's body. "All right, Mr. George," said Priscilla. After Priscilla was in bed. Aunt Virginia came into the room. She came over and sat down beside her in the bed. The undertaker had come and gone a long time ago, and some men from a newspaper had been and gone, too,

"Tell me how it happened now, Priscilla."

"I don't know."

"Why are you so stubborn?" "I don't know. She said to look at the redbird. I tried to sec it, I couldn't, When I turned around, she was on the ground."

"What else?" "Nothing, except that Mr. George told me to go to my room," "George?" "Yes."

"Did you see him?" "No"

"No, what?"

"No. Aunt Virginia." "How do you know it was George?"

"I know."

"How?" "I heard him." She spoke resentfully. not understanding why Aunt Virginia vain for the bird. 3_2 pressed her so. "Besides, Mr. George pressed her so. Besides, Mr. George talks to me every night before I go to sleep."

Aunt Virginia looked grim and pale.

Her lips were twitching a little at one corner and her eyes were narrowed. Her hands were elenched on her knees. Deep within her there was a trembling of fear, an insistent awareness which she pushed back with fierce determination.

"You are a wicked little girl," said Aunt Virginia. "What does he say?"

Aunt Virginia. "What does he sa Priscilla, hurt, shook her head.

"Answer me."

Priscilla said nothing.

"Priscilla!" No answer.

18

Baffled and angry, Virginia got up and walked out of the room, turning the light switch at the door.

light switch at the door.

Priscilla waited until she was sure the woman had gone; then she got up in the darkness and found her doll. She returned to bed with it, and tueled Celine in. Then she tipseed to the door and opened it a little. Aunt Virgain had gone downstair; a faint stratching sound rose to Priscilla's listening ears. Aunt Virgain was writing something; but, of course, she would be writing all about Adelaile. Threilla cloude the door soundlessly and tipseed bed to her bed, creating in and sunggling done to Celine.

ALL the intimate sounds of the old house crept into the room, bringing their tranquility. Swinging always made Priscilla fired, and even though she had not been swung as much as usual that afternoon, she was still tired. She drowsed, but she did not sleep. She waited confidently for Mr. George to come.

Having finished her letter, Virginia

Leckett put out the lamp and stood for a moment to accustom herself to the darkness. Then she went up the stairs without light. She paused at Priscilla's door.

door.

What was it within? Voices or a voice?

She listened.

"Why don't you ever come where I can see you plainer, Mr. George?"

can see you plainer, Mr. George?" Virginia heard no answer.

"Do you sleep there by the door, Mr. George?"

No sound.
"All right, Mr. George,"

Thereafter silence.

Noiselessly, Virginia opened the door and looked into the room. The bed was spectral over near the window, and the child dark in it. Darkness filled the room—and yet more dark. Was it an accident of sight that the seemed to see a dark shadow bulking there beside the bed? Yes? Or no! Virginia stared. The intensity of her gove tridded her; the rays of light from the street seemed to dance; they shone through the shadow beside the bed. Virginia doods her eyes and the start of the start of the start of the theory of the start of the start of the start them open. Nothing had changed.

She withdrew, closing the door and standing with her back against it.

stamming with ner once, against it.

In a moment she was sharply, frighteningly aware of meance beyond the door, a potent danger threatening her. It was intangibility. She started away from the door to stand in baring for that intangibility is her stand away from the door to stand in barheredly, grintly. She was too close to here goal now to be frightened by her imagination. She came back to the door once again, pressing against it with the length of the body. There was something beyond it, something lurking there, waiting. She elenched her hands in a gesture of defiance and moved away to her own room.

There she sat for a long time trying to think what it was that had seed hold of her imagination so vividly, trying to piece together the events of Priscibla's world, thinking always of the instant fact that now that Adelaide was gone, also allow evodul inherit time hundred thousand dollars as soon as Priscibla was gone. That was the world, that was independence, security, freedom for life.

IT WAS late when they came back from the funeral. Virginia had thriftily engaged a car to take them to the cemetery, but not to bring them back. They came back on the streetcar, Laura Craig's presence at the services had vexed Virginia, so that she was unusually short with Priscilla. She recognized that Laura would have liked control over Priscilla; she knew that Laura was genuinely fond of the child, and she resented this-not because of any feeling of possession, but simply because she knew that when something happened to Priscilla, Laura Craig would put people up to asking questions. It was a wonder she had not done so about George Mowell

Newell.

As she stepped into the hall in the late afternoon, Virginia thought she saw someone standing at the foot of the stains; but at that moment Priseilla darted forward with a little cry, and she followed her with her eyes where she ran for the stairs and up. When she looked back, there was nothing there.

Nevertheless, she was troubled by the increasing frequency of what could only be illusious. She put away her good coat and hat, and went out into the kitchet to put together something for the supper table. In the routine of getting a meal, she forgot about her illusions, and thought only about how long she must wait before she could take care of Priscilla and cuter upon that new world of her dreams.

Priscilla came in, divested of her good clothes and plainly attired in a print dress.

"Didn't you see him. Aunt Virginia?"

she cried.
"See whom?"

"Mr. George. He was really and truly standing there when we came in."

Virginia prevented herself from striking the child just in time. She stood looking at her coldly for a long time before she could bring herself to speak. "I never want to hear his name again, do you understand?"

"Yes. Aunt Virginia."

"I never want it mentioned in this

"I never want it mentioned in this house again, do you hear?"

"Yes, Aunt Virginia. You don't have to scream."

"I'm not screaming!"
Her voice screamed back at her from the walls, shrill, raucous, unpleasant, until the sound diminished and faded into the kitchen's silence, which lay like a mountain between the child with her curious bright eyes, and the angry, frightened woman.

THE summer passed, and autumn

In October, Virginia Leckett could contain herself no longer. Her patience had worn thin. Even the need of showing some superficial concern for Priscilla was becoming increasingly difficult. MR GEORGE

She had evolved a plan for which must be Priscilla's fatal accident. It was not original. She had observed that the child was in the habit of running along the upper hall and down the stairs, despite their steepness.

It should be a very simple matter to fix a thin wire across the head of the stairs, half a foot or so from the floor: Priscilla could not possibly avoid tripping over it. The tumble down the stairs might not kill her, but the chances were good that it would. She waited one night until Priscilla had gone to her room. Then she went quickly to the head of the stairs and fixed the wire around the posts there, and, stepping over it, hastened to the foot of the stairs.

"Priscilla!" she called, "Come down here-quick!"

From where she stood, she could make out the thin wire because a little light struck up toward it from below. would be invisible to Priscilla

The door of Priscilla's room opened. "Did you call me, Aunt Virginia?"

"Yes. Come down, quick."

She came running down the hall. Virginia stood open-mouthed, watching, a kind of bestial eagerness stirring within her. But at the head of the stairs Priscilla stopped. A kind of shuddering horror chilled Virginia, for she saw a familiar dark shadow holding the child back with one tenuous arm, while with the other it unwound the wire from the posts. Only when it had been pulled away from Priscilla's path was she permitted to go on. Down she came. "What's the matter, Aunt Virginia?" Virginia's tongue was thick. "I told you-to come-quick. What kept you?" "He did." "Who?"

"You know who, You said not to mention his name again." A harsh burst of laughter broke from Virginia's dry lips. She reached down and took the child by the hand. "Come along," she said. "We'll see."

CHE went up the stairs, forcing herself, driving herself every step of the way, so that Priscilla walked always a little ahead of her.

They went directly to Priscilla's room. Virginia stopped at the threshold.

"There is nobody here but us," she said. "Do you see?"

Priscilla looked around. "He can hide anywhere," she said.

Virginia shook her head. "Do you hear me? There is nobody here but us. Say that after me."

"You're hurting me."

"Say it!" said Virginia in a furious voice.

"There is nobody here but us," repeated Priscilla, frightened now.

"There is nobody in this house but us," Virginia went on, her voice rising.

Say it. Go on-say it."

"There is nobody in this house but us," said Priscilla. She took a deep breath and added courageously, "And

Mr. George."

In an access of thwarted rage, Virginia beat Priscilla unmercifully until the child escaped her and ran to hide under the bed. Breathing heavily, Virginia left the room, slamming the door, and leaning against it to listen. Only the child's sobbing came into the darkness of the hall. "Are you ready, Virginia?"

She whirled.

Standing almost near enough to touch her was a dark something that spoke to her in George Newell's voice—a horrible sentient darkness without substance but exuding a malignance great enough to send her pulse high in terror. The malign shadow reached toward her.

She screamed and burst away.

She ran faster than she had ever run

She ran faster than she had e before toward the stairs.

Too late, she saw that the wire was back in place. She tripped and hurtled down the stairs like a rag doll, while the shadow paused to unwind the wire once again.

Priscilla, after a few moments of uncertainty, came to the threshold of her room and stood in the open doorway.

"Aunt Virginia?" she asked of the darkness.

"Priscilla."

"Yes, Mr. George."
"Priscilla, go to Laura, Tell her Aunt Virginia fell downstairs and broke her neck. You are going to stay with Laura now."

"Yes, Mr. George. Are you coming, too?"

"No. I'm going away, and this time I'll stay. Unless you need me."

"Oh, don't go, Mr. George!"

"Get your things and go to Laura.

"Get your things and go to Laura, Priscilla."

OBEDIENTLY she went back to her room and got Celine out of bed.

She put on Celine's hat and then her own. Grandfather Dedman's clock said, "Pris-sie, Pris-sie, Pris-sie, Go-to-sleepnow, Pris-sie," and then struck ten sombre bongs which rang through the house like a tocsin.

Priscilla went out of the room and down the stairs, walking carefully around Aunt Virginia, expecting that any moment that horrible inert mass might spring up and strike her again. At the front door she turned and looked bravely back into the darkness.

"Good-bye, Mr. George," she said.

She thought there was an answer, but she could not be sure. Perhaps it was just Grandfather Dedman's clock with a last, reproachful "Pris-sie."

She got on the street-ear at the corner.

"Are you alone, Miss Priscilla?" asked the conductor. "At this time of night?"

"Yes. sir."

"Did you run away?"

"Oh, no. I've got to go somewhere else." Gravely, she told him the address.

"Why, that's way over on the other side of the city! What can she be thinking of to let you go alone!"

Irate, he clanged a passing taxi to a stop, got out with Priscilla and put her into it, giving the driver explicit direc-

Laura Craig, white-faced, listened to Priscilla, and, having heard, went directly to the telephone. She called the Leckett to the telephone. She called the Leckett house.

Priscilla heard the ringing for a long time. But of course there was no an-time. But, of course, there was no answer. So she knew that Mr. George was gone, too, like all the rest of them.

Hoodooed

BY SEABURY QUINN

... and revenge comes on both sides of the grave

ERRICOTE flattened on the sonping leaf mould as the cavalry patrol splashed by. It was at least the thousandth time that he had taken similar cover in the past four days, and creeping like a snake among the underbrush or lying quiet as a rabbit in a briar patch had become automatic with him every time he heard the pound of horseshoes or the scuff of marching feet. Fatigue was now so deep that it was almost anesthesia, his uniform was ripped to tatters by the brambles, his eyes were gritty with sleep and hunger gnawed at his midriff like a starved rat. But he could still smile. "I'm surely gettin' an elegant worm's eye view of O' Virginny," he grinned as the last of the rain-slicked blue backs disappeared around the bend of the woods road.

Orders to abandon. Petersburg has come early on the morning of the second, and he had gone out with his squadron to cover the retreat of Greenleaf's infantry. They knew the Yanks were pressing on the earthworks, for beyond the leafscreen of the April woods they bear arattle of musketry and the dull, almost continuous roar of cannon. It would not be long before the hast desperate rear guard fell back, then . . . . . . . . . . . .

At noon they paused for a meal of corn pone and the parched rye and acorn that did duty for coffee, The fire had hardly begun crackling underneath the pot when the blue-bellies came galloping over the rise, sturdy, well-fed veterans of Phil Sheridan's command, riding hell-forleather and yelling like Comanches.

"Mount." Derricote spat out a mouthful of seasonless corn bread. "Draw sabers! Forward — trot — gallop charge!" He drove the spurs in Caesar's Itanks and the tired horse snorted furiously as he strained against the bridle. Behind him his men rode stirrup to stirrup in a long wedge whose point was the tip of his saber thrusting like a unicom's horn from beyond Caesar's starting eves.

They raised the Redel Yell as they dashed at the blue-clad rank, but the Yankees did not meet them. Instead, they farmed out in a deep V, then closed in like the jaws of a steel trap, battering his more with subsery, suborting them from the saddle—he drove a victious threat at a down to dash his him in a grimmer and down to dash his him in a grimmer faced corporal's month, evaded the shot of a broad-bladded saber, then with a sudden, wast, outrageous crash, the world had come to one that the sudden, wast, outrageous crash, the world had come to one the sudden, wast, outrageous crash, the world had come to one the sudden, wast, outrageous crash, the world had come to one the sudden.

How long he lay senseless he had no idea. The patter of the gentle April rain on his face wakened him, and when he sat up dizzily he saw the dark had come and, save for some grotesque gray-clad forms that sprawled unnaturally on the fresh grass and one or two stiff-legged horses lying motionless as uprooted tree stumps, he had the field to himself. His horse, his men, even the enemy had disampeared.

He felt for his watch, Gone, So were his gold cuff links and cameo. They'd taken time to on through him, apparently, before they rode back to report their victory-or maybe it had been his own men who rifled his pockets. He noted with a grin that had no humor in it that they'd left his wallet stuffed with fifty-dollar hills: Confederate money had small buying power, even south of Mason-Dixon's Line, but gold was gold the world over. That watch or those cuff links or scarf pin would be legal tender at any sutler's, enough to buy a slab of side of meat or even a nound of coffee-real coffee, not the parched and pounded rve and acorn the South had used until the taste of mocha had become no more than a vague memory.

By degrees he regained control of his legs. The blow that knocked him out must have turned on the brass button on his kepi, so that only the flat of the blade hit him. There was a lump almost as big as a pigeon's egg just above his right ear, but there was no blood on his hand when he brought it down from his head, and the soft spring rain was cool and soothing on his upturned face. Unsteadily, but gaining fresh stability with each step, he walked across the field, then halted fifty yards or so from the highway. There was no sign or sound of life anywhere. Greenleaf's men, together with the remnants of his squadron would have gone long since, either making for the rendezvous on the Appomattox or striking overland toward Lynchburg and the mountains. Grant and Weitzel would be on their flanks like gadflies, Union troopers would be between him and them—the drumming of shod hoofs and clatter of accourtement came to him even as he halted, and he dropped face-downward to the sod, arms clasped above his head.

THE patrol galloped by so close that water from the horses' pounding hoofs splashed on him. "There's another of 'em, Bill," he heard a trooper call to the man next him as they clattered past. "O!' Simpson must a cut them Johnnie up in style this mornin'."

"Yeah, an' we'll have the rest of 'em by tomorrer if things keep up this-a-way. Jeez, how them Rebs can fight with nothin' in their bellies sure beats hell, don't it?"

don't it?"
"Wal," the voice of a third trooper had a Middle-Western twang to it, "I reckon that's because they're Amurricans, too. Any other army would of chucked the towel in long ago, but these fellers will fight till they've shot their last ca'trider, then (en to one they'll fight us with the bay'nit till we've killed the whole damn kit-kaboodle of 'em.'' The patrol trotted out of sight and Derricote rose cautiously, staggering across the sodden meadow till he reached a patch of woodland and found friendly shelter in the undergrowth.

Since then he'd played a desperate game of hide and seek with bands of Yankee cavalry and infantry detachments, hiding, creeping into bramble patches and small thickets when a Northern patrol hove in view, trudging turtively along the road, or running across fields when no enemy was in sight, getting bandous from farmers' wives, but always working steadily toward Laurelwood and sanetuary-Laurelwood, where they would bathe and feed him, let him sleep between clean sheets and recruit strength to rejoin Lee's army and fight, as the Yankee trooper put it, "till the last ea'tridge had been fired."

He lay listening a few moments when the cavalry detail had passed, making sure no more were following, then got to his fect once more and erept through the woods until he came out at the hilltop overlooking the plantation. The rain had stopped, and in the light of a low moon he looked across the cently rolling land while a lump rose in his throat and a sob formed in his chest. The breeze that blew across the fields was redolent with memories, for this had been his second home, more dear to him than any place on earth except his father's farmstead, since he had been a little lad. Here he had a riddle on his first fox hunt, here he had danced his first quadrille and polka, here he had shared life with Jessica since childhood, From that wide, white-pillared porch he had ridden to join his troop in '62, brave in his spotless new gray uniform with a red rose from her knotted in the gold cord of his aiguilette and the remembrance of her kiss upon his lips, "I'll be waitin' for you. Howard," she had promised as she tightened soft hare arms about his neek, "waitin' for my brave, victorious lover-"

"Maybe he won't be victorious," he had interrupted. "Mr. Lincoln's raised three hundred thousand volunteers, and they're already almost two to one-"

"Howard Derrieote, how you talk! To hear you anyone would think one Southerner couldn't whip ten Yankees with one hand tied behind him. Of course you'll win this war, an' take of Lincoln prisoner, too!"

"But if we should lose, Jessica-"

The somberness in his voice sobered her. "Win or lose, my lover-man, there'll never be another for me. I've loved you since I was a little girl, an' all my life I'll keep on lovin' you. It's not as if we were just ordinary people; we've been together so much that we've grown to be part of each other. You're like my heart-I just couldn't go on livin' without you, honey-lamb," Then she had drawn his face down to here as he leaned from the saddle, kissed him on both checks and on the mouth, and after that . . . the clatter of the gravel under Caesar's hoofs, the long, hot, dusty road to camp Fair Oaks, Gains Mill and Mechanicsville, three years of almost constant fighting while victory after victory cheered the gray-clad soldiers of the South, But Nashville, Chicamauga and Chat,anooga were another story: Gettysburg and Cold Harbor were blows that sent the once-victorious army recling from the field to take shelter behind hastily constructed earthworks. Now Petersburg had been abandoned, and Richmond, capital of the Confederacy, The end was in sight, inevitable, . . .

A small, irresolute breeze played hesitantly among the leafage, and a sigh that was half gratitude at homeeoming, half sorrow, escaped him. The oak and maple trees that grew around the big house tossed their leaf-laced branches till they seemed to ripple like green spray; beyond the rolling fields there stood the unforgotten eircle of blue hills, and everywhere the mountain laurel from which the plantation took its name was bursting into bud.

A SQUARE of luminance attracted his attention. That would be the cabin of old Mammy Cicely, the aged manumitted Negress at whose black breast two generations of Skipwell children had nursed. Mammy Ciss possessed a widespread reputation as a "conjur 'oman," her boss-fix powders were famous, as were the love charms she concocted, the stay-home potions which kept errant wives' and husbands' eyes-and affections-from roving were known as sovereign remedies in domestic crises, and her git-away charms had more than once sent a strayed man back to his fireside. It was rumored and believed that she possessed more sinister powers. Madness was a thing almost unknown among the Negrocs, yet there had been instances of it. Field hands and house servants alike shook their heads and whispered-but not in hearing of the white folks-that Mammy Ciss had "spelled" the lunatics. and more than one mysterious illness and unexplained death had been laid to her door. Those who approached her cabin sceking favors walked charily as Saul when he sought out the Witch of Endor, But Mammy Ciss had always been his friend. Her hut would offer sanctuary. He could get water there to wash away the grime of flight and battle before he went to the big housemake himself at least halfway presentable.

He hurried down the grassy slope, climbed the stone fence that marked the boundary of the cabin's plot of land, and knocked on the rough puncheons of the door.

The light behind the window was obseured a moment as a figure passed before the fire, and a deep musical voice challenged, "Who dar?" "Mammy Ciss," he answered in a whisper, for caution had become a habit with him, "it's I——Marse Howard." "Who?"

"Howard Derricote. You know, Marse

Howard-" "Bress de Lawd!" The door flung open and a pair of calico-clad arms enfolded him, straining him against a deep, capacious bosom. "Hit's sho'-nuff Marse Howard hisself! Mah other baby's done come back ter me!" He had been nurtured at a black breast, brought up, corrected-sometimes soundly spanked-by colored mammies, and the warm affection he had for this woman's kind was unaffected as it was natural. He kissed the gleaming chocolate-colored cheeks and out his arms about the massive shoulders, returning the old woman's embrace fervently as it was given. Then, as she drew him into the neat single room of the cabin, "Got any hot water aroundand something to eat?" he demanded. "Lord, but I'm hungry-and dirty!"

"Yuh jes' set dar an' res' yo'sef, honey," the Negress answered. "Pull off yo' boots an' favor yo' feets. Ah'll git some vittles fo' yuh in two shakes an' set de kittle b'llin' fo' yo' baff in half a minit."

"Lawdy, but yah's beat-out lookin', Marse Howard," the old woman sympathized as she refilled his plate. "Whut dey bin doin' ter mah baby?" "Chasin' him, I reckon you'd call it,"

"Chasin' him, I reckon you'd call it," he responded with a grin. "Chasin' him up hill and down dale. How's Miss Jessica?"

She busied herself with the eoffee pot a moment, refilling his cup and adding cream and syrup. Two horizontal wrinkles furrowed themselves across her forchead and her eyes did not meet his

"I said, 'How's Miss Jessica?' an edge of sudden sharpness came to his voice. He knew the symptoms. She had heard his question perfectly, but after the immemorial manner of her kind she had to mull it over before bringing out a suitably poncommittal reply.

"She's tol'able, Ah reckon, suh."
"What d've nican? She isn't ill, is she?"

"Naw, suh. Ain't nothin' happen to her, exxacly—" Her eyes sought the square of the window, seemed to search among the glowing embers on the hearth, finally came back to his, but showed hardly any expression.

"See here, Mamny," a sudden feeling of apprehension made his voice tremble, "you know Miss Jessica and I are to be married..."

"Yas, suh. Ah knows hit."
"Very well, then. If anything's gone wrong for her I have a right to know it. I must know if I'm to help her."

"She don' need no he'pin, Marse Howard."
"Well, then, what is it?" Exasperation made his words brittle.

"Well, suh, Marse Howard—" she was plainly embarrassed and just as plainly ager to avoid hurting him—"hit's dis yere way. Yuh know de Yankees come an' tuck de big house fo' dey haidquarters—"

"Took Laurelwood? No! When?"

"Erbout six months ergo, suh. Dey's still verc—"

"Good Lord!" He started up from the table, oversetting his chair. "Poor Jessie —if they've harmed her—"

--if they've harmed her--"

"Dey ain't done her no hurt, suh.
But--"

"Yes? But--" He could have shaken her in his impatience.

"Well, suh, Marse Howard, hit 'pears ter me lak she's bin mighty civil ter dem Yankee ossifers..."

Yankee ossifers..."

"Good heavens, Mammy Ciss, how you scared me!" He set his chair upright and collapsed into it weakly. "Of course, she's civil to them. Miss Jessica is a she's civil to them. Miss Jessica is a lady and whatever they may tell you otherwise, there are Yankee gentlemen. You know I lived among 'em while I went to Harvard College."

"Yassuh'" She seemed unconvinced.

"Yassuh?" She seemed unconvinced.

"Of course. But this is serious, this business of Laurelwood's being used for their headquarters. If they catch me they'll put me in prison, and—" "Dey ain't gwine ter ketch yuh, honey chile. Yuh ies' res' easy. Mammy Ciss'll sec yuh gits erway."

"But Miss Jessica—I've come all the way from Petersburg to see her-"

"Dat'll be a'right, too, sugar. Ah'll run up to de big house an' tell her yuh's come home. She'll come a-runnin' when she hears dat. Den when yuh's through yo' co'tin' yuh kin steal erway--"

"You think of everything, don't you?"
he laughed, "But it's too early in the mornin' to wake her. Let her sleen a mornin' to wake her. Let her sleep a while, and"—he stifled a prodigious yawn—"let me get some sleep, too. I haven't had a peaceful pap in almost a week." HE HAD been more exhausted than he realized, for when he woke with a start and glaneed toward the window he saw the air was stained a lilac purple and the sky was a deep turquoise with a vein of tender amethyst run through it. Outside he heard the rhythmic rub of knuckles on a washboard, the splashing of soap suds and Mammy Ciss as she sang at her work:

Ah's gwine ter glory, gwine ter glory, Ah's gwine ter glory, Yas, mah Lawd!

"Mammy Ciss?"

"Yassuh, Marse Howard, honey?" "What're you doin'?"

"Washin' out yo' clo'se, sugar, Ah 'elare ter glory, dcy wuz filthy as er polecat!" "Bring my uniform at once, please," "Cain't, honey-lamb, Hit's in de tub dis minit, an' presen'ly Ah aims ter gib hit eh good goin'-ober wif de sad-iron. Ah's mended hit an' fixed hit, but phew! hit cer'ainly wuz dirty. 'Pears ter me hit was so stiff hit would 'a' held vuh up if you'd fell down!" Consternation seized him, "D've mean you've got all my clothes in the tub?"

"Nawsuh, Marse Howard, honey, Yo' shirt an' underclo'se is on de line now dryin', an' I snuk up to de big house an' got vuh er fresh change o' raiment. Marse Willie won't be needin' 'em no mo' since they kilt him daid at Cedar Crick. Yuh jes' lay quiet er spell. Ah'll bring a tubful o' hot water fo yuh presen'ly an' vuh can wash yo'self all nice an' pritty fo' Miss Jessica when she comes ober from de big house."

"Yahhuh, soon's de sun hides her face. She cain't go gallivantin' off ter see vuh right under dem Yankee gen'lemen's noses in broad daylight."

It was pleasant to lie there between the coarse, clean sheets and watch the night come gently down as if a curtain of soft lavender were drawn aeross the sky, and in a little while a star or two peeked out from the dim vault of the heavens, and behind the purple-shadowed hills the moon rose, laying silver plating over everything.

"She's comin' here?"

Mammy Ciss lugged in a washtub with two pails of steaming water, with a plate of soft soap and a dishrag gourd for washcloth.

"Now vuh jes' make vo'self all sweet an' clean," she admonished, "an bime-by Miss Jessica'll be yere."

Half an hour later, rested, bathed and dressed in a fresh suit of homespun, he lounged outside the cabin door while Mammy busied herself with the intricate process of frying chicken in the spider. Instinctively he east a planter's weatherwise eye at the sky. The rain had softened the ground well, and there would be a spell of fair, warm days if he were any judge. Ideal for getting in the seed, It only they could find the labor and stave Grant off until the crops were gathered they might retreat to the mountains and carry on guerrilla warfare till-

"Howard!" The bail came in the wellremembered, loved voice, and with a patter of small feet on the flagstones she came running to him through the scented darkness. Both her hands were lifted to him, and both of his reached out to hers.

"Oh, Jess, my dear-my dear!" he almost sobbed as his arms closed about her and he held her to him a long, trembling moment. He had borne the memory of her in his heart three years, half the time not realizing she was there, as much a heart three the heart three heart three heart she was the blood coursing in his veins, but even the precious memory had not done justice to this graceful, fragile woman with hair the color of ripe corn and eyes as blue as July skies. She taened acquisit him for a mount with her face upturned and eyes closed, and a sudden chill, like that which comes into the air when wind-blown clouds obscure the sun, seemed spreading over his heart, for though she made no move to free herself lips were passive under his, and he might almost as well have held a lovely, lifeless statue in his arms.

HE PUT her from him gently, holding the ty both shoulders and lookat her with hurt, puzzled eyes. "J'ess, dear, what is it? You seem so strange, soold, Don't you." He could not complete the question, but continued gazing at her as a starving man might gaze at food. For the first time he noticed that the long dark eape above her white gown was blue lined with light yellow—a Yanlee officer's close.

Once more her hands sought his, and when she looked at him it seemed that all feeling had gone from her eyes. "You mustn't stay here, Howard," she whispered.

"'Of course, not, dear. Manuny Ciss has told me how they've squatted troops on you. If I were caught it would mean one less officer for Marse Robert, and he's needin' every able-bodied man. We're not through yet, Jess darling. The crops will be in presently, and if we can hold out till winter—"

"No, Howard; no!" There was a dead finality in her tone. "It's no use; none whatever. Remember what you said the night you went away-that Lincoln had two men for every one of ours? That isn't half, or a third of it. He has three, five, a dozen soldiers to our one, and fresh recruits are coming in each day. The Southern cause is doomed, Howard, and when we've lost the war we'll be a crushed and ruined people. Even if they let us keep our land it will be worthless without slave labor; there'll be no wealth, no happiness, no gracious living anywhere but in the North, and"-her voice faltered, stopped altogether, then went on tonclessly as that of an old woman-"and I am going there to live, Howard."

"But, Jess dear, this is our home, our country. Our fathers held it under Royal grant, defended it from red-estate men of the woods, then from red-estate men of the King. Its very clay is stained with our best blood. We're part and pared of this land, dearest. We can't leave it to founder, as they say the rats desert the sinking ship—"

"I didn't say that we were going. Howard. I said I am. There is a Yan—a Union officer, a Captain Amesbury—"

"Oha?" The exclamation came grittily from his throat,

"I know what you'd say, Howard, but it isn't so. He is a gentleman, as finely bred as you or I. His family helpec to found Connecticut; they have amorial bearings old and honorable as ours—" "Do you love him, Jessica?"

She ignored the question, hurried her defense. "They're wealthy, too. They're had everything that money buys for generations, and all that's come to them has had a chance to grow. They're rich and cultured—and secure."

"Do you love him, Jessica?" His low voice was insistent as accusing conscience.

"Oh, what difference does it make?

"Oh, what difference does it make? I have my life to live, my future to consider. I've not been used to poverty. I couldn't scrimp and sew and bake and scrub like white trash. Won't you try to understand?"

"I think that I can understand without half trying," he answered levelly, but in his heart there was a dreadful, soundless cry, "Dear God, to think that I have worshipped such a poor thing all these years of bloody war!"

Her lips moved soundlessly, groping desperately for words. "You hate me, don't you, Howard?"

"Hate you? No. One can't hate what he's loved so long, so dearly—" His voice did not quite break, but it came out of his throat without any tone.

"Oh, please, please try not to be so bitter! Some day, perhaps, you'll understand, and—Oh?" The exclamation was half sob of dismay, half involuntary cry of terror, and she turned from him with a swirl of drapery, running up the nath that led to the bir house.

She vanished in the shrouding shrubbery, running soundlessly as a pursued cat, and involuntarily he followed. "Jessical" he had to make one last effort, have one final word. "Jessica--"

"Who goes there? Halt, or I'll fire!"

Moonlight glinting on a carbine barrel and the buttons of a cavalryman's blouse, Heart-sickening realization came to Howard as he raised his hands. She must have seen the soldier coming as she looked across his shoulder, seen and run away without warning him.

THE Yankee colonel cleared his throat. He was a chunky, short man with iron-gray hair, thick-fingered, beatyshouldered, a little puffy at the waist, a little dired-looking about the cyse, with a square-cut, sloid face that seemed woren, vaguely unhuman, yet institut Derricore, the court finds you guily of the specification of being out of uniform and in our lines. Therefore, under the specification of being out of uniform and in our lines. Therefore, under law, you are adjudged a spy. Have you anything to say why sentence should not be passed on you?

"Speak up, man, this is your last chance. It's suicide to keep silent!" his counsel urged in a fierce whisper, but Howard looked at him with a bleak smile and stared back levelly at the colonel.

"Nothing, sir."

"Then it is the sentence of this courtmartial that at sunrise tomorrow, April 7, 1865, you be shot to death by musketry, and may God have mercy on your soul."

That had been at ten o'clock last night, and even though be had no watch he had been able to keep track of time by changes of the guard. The sentry standing before the springhouse where they had confined him had been changed three times, that would mean six hours gone, be had at most two more before they—He shrugged his shoulders impatiently. Why didn't key get it over!

His world had gone to pieces under him, despair engulfed him like a choking, strangling cloud of poison vapor. Anticipating his defense they had put Jessica upon the witness stand, and, "Miss Skipwell, do you recognize the prisoner?" asked the judge advocate.

Her face had the smooth, even tone of ivory in the glow of the astral lamps as she looked at him with eyes that were examined he forbade it. What was the use? If she could swear his life away so heartlessly, what was the use? Misery of flesh and spirit flooded through him, and the eyes he turned on her were terrible in their fixed stare, but she would not meet his gaze.

him before."

the eyes of a stranger. "I never saw

When his counsel would have cross-

Old Mammy Ciss had told a true, straightforward story, but when her testimony was completed the judge advocate advanced on her. Howard's wallet in his hand. "This was found in your house, Do you recognize it?"

"'Course, Ah does, Hit's Marse Howard's pocketbook." He opened the wallet, counted out a dozen fifty-dollar bills of the Confederacy. "I invite the court's attention to this currency," he laid the bills on the table, spreading them out fanwise. "The witness could not be expected to know that it is worthless; it must have seemed a fortune to her, and I submit that for a much less sum she could have been induced to swear to anything,"

"The court takes notice of the currency and of the circumstances in which it was found," the colonel ruled, Between the prejudice of the court-martial and Jessica's perjury his defense had been crushed to dust.

A KEY grated in the pleasant, cultured KEY grated in the lock, and "May voice of his counsel asked.

"Of course," Howard rose from the cot on which he had not slept and took the Yankee's proffered hand, "But please don't ask me to make a plea for clemencv---" "To old Dutcher? No fear! Persewheedling Pluto into giving her a latchkey. I've brought you some segars and whiskey to help pass the time. We haven't a chaplain on the post, but"-his face flushed with embarrassment as he tugged at the pocket of his military frock coat--"I've brought along a Prayer Book. Thought you might like to read it while you're waiting-"

phone would have a better chance of

"Thanks." Howard took the proffered gifts and laid them on the table. "I appreciate your thoughtfulness, Captain." By the irony of fate they had assigned him this young man for counsel. Captain Prescott Amesbury, the man Jessica was to marry, and despite everything he had liked him instantly. Fair and tall, lean, long-iawed, he was: true Norman-English ancestry was marked in his features, his gray eyes had a look of frank candor and his checks the high color of one bred in a land of cold mists and snows. The unaffected gentility of his voice and manner proclaimed him as much a product of the best the North could offer as Howard was of Southern aristocracy. In happier circumstances these men could have been firm friends.

His voice was casual and friendly, not demanding an answer, merely inviting one. "You were born near here, Captain?"

"Not far away?"

"Know the country round about quite intimately?"

"Fairly." "It's odd you didn't know the Skip-well family. I should have thought that neighbors would have been friends." Howard shook his head, "You heard the testimony, Captain. The court-martial believed it; you might as well."

The other gave a relieved sigh, breathed.

"Thanks, Captain. The young lady of the house. Miss Skipwell, might be gravely embarrassed if the old colored woman's testimony were accepted. I don't think Colonel Dutcher would hesitate a moment to have her shot merely because she happens to be a woman."

"If you don't mind, Captain"-how Howard kept his voice steady he had no idea, but somehow he contrived it-"I'd like to be alone until-"

"Of course," the other rose, held out his hand. "I'm sorry, Captain Derricote, genuinely sorry. Our country will have need of men like you when the war's over. It's a pity, a great pity, but-c'est la querre, as the French say."

HOWARD picked the Prayer Book up and thumbed through it. ". . . for I have eaten ashes as it were bread and minaled my drink with weeping. . . . " Amen to that. Bread turned to ashes, everything that he had loved and trusted proven false, his country on the verge of defeat, the woman he had worshipped a traitress and iill-flirt ready to deny her country and contract a loveless marriage that her way of life might be continued, ready to deny she'd ever known him lest she be involved. . . .

Once more the key grated in the lock and the door swung open to reveal a young man in the uniform of a lieutenant of cavalry. He was little more than a boy and his cheeks were almost grey in the light of the lantern held by the sentry. For a moment he stood irresolute, then brought his hand up to the brim of his slouch hat, "Are you ready, Captain Derricote?" he asked, and it seemed to Howard that his lips fumbled for the words. "Quite ready, Lieutenant," Howard laid the Prayer Book down, Somehow, he

For him it would be over in a little while, the other had to live with it as long as he The sky was still dark, but the beginning light gave promise of an immaculate dawn as they marched toward the stone felt a boundless pity for this youngster.

fence bordering the barnyard. Two squads of cavalrymen were drawn up facing each other, leaving a narrow lane between. At the far end of this aisle there showed an ominous square of blank stone wall, and as Howard and his escort marched between the double ranks an order came sharply: "Present arms!" and the troopers' carbines snapped to sainte. "No blindfold, if you please, Licutenant," Howard asked, "I've looked into gun muzzles too often to be frightened of 'em-"

"Just as you please, Captain," the young man agreed. His tecth were almost chattering and he could hardly control his voice. "Excuse me, this is necessary." From his pocket he drew out a square of paper about the size of a playing card and fastened it with a pin to Howard's coat over the left breast

Howard leaned against the stone wall and closed his eyes more in wearmess than to shut out the sight of the eight men standing at attention ten paces away. Two years-even two days-ago he would have rebelled. Now nothing seemed to matter. Defeat was bad enough, but Jessica-his jaw hardened and his muscles tightened. Might she know the misery that was his, might she see her worldthe world for which she'd betrayed love and loyalty-break in pieces as his had-

The volley struck him with the impact of a knotted fist. The bullets didn't burt. They knocked the wind out of him, made him feel dizzy—numb.

He trembled for a moment like a man beset with chill, leaned slightly forward. then sank slowly as the stiffening went from his knees. He fell face-forward on the ground and lay there quivering, not with pain, but in the final reflex of the body as the soul takes its departure. The young lieutenant who commanded the firing squad ran forward, cocked revolver in hand. He checked his step before the pool of blood that wodened on the ground, pressing his lips together and averting his eyes. The prisoner was still breathing and his body twitched spasmodically. The youngster pressed the muzzle of his Colt against the prone man's temple, pulled the trigger. The head lifted to the shock of the bullet, then fell back. The body contracted with a final shudder and lay still.

TESSICA knelt by her window watching the light pale in the east. She had not slept. All night she'd paced her bedroom floor, knelt by the window when tired muscles screamed for rest, then risen to resume her pacing. In her nightrobe of sheer linen she was like a sheeted specter, for her face was almost pale as the white garment and the blood seemed to have retreated from her lips, leaving them without a trace of color-Flesh and spirit, faith and unfaith, wrestled in her, and the flesh and unfaith won. A dozen times she went as far as the door, intent on going to the colonel and telling him the truth. Each time she paused with her hand on the knob. Suppose the colonel refused to believe her? Suppose he should decide that she, too, was a spy? They'd put her in prison-maybe shoot her as they A dawn breeze came across the fields like a spirit walking, and in the east the first rays of the sun came over the hills like a battalion of slim gilded lances. From the barnyard she heard a voice, brittle as an ielde: "Squad forward—front rank kneel—ready—aim—fire!"

The silence was split by a shot, then like the crackling of a clap of summer thunder came a ragged volley that ripped the air as if it had been dry paper, and a moment later the dull report of a pistol like the popping of a champagne cork.

The hand papping of a champingue conlifer hands clutched at the still, but there was no strength in her fingers and there mixed year to the strength of the Howard Derricote lay in the barryard. A blue jay, startled by the shooting, gave a rancous cavi kn-n-n-n-tl kn-n-n-n-tl and in the pine copse beyond the measlow a mocking bird mimicked the cry, then burst into a flood of song.

NO ONE gold attention to the aged Negrous holding round the place of execution later in the morning—so one but jack-Ambrose, builer and factoum of the big house, who had chosen to remain and wait upon the Yankee officers As he saw Mannny Ciss delve in the soft mortar of the barn wall and extract a flattened carbine builet, then scrape all title blood-stander durith from the barnyard, Jack-Ambrose thrust this knowleds hard against his morth, and his self notice that the state of the doo; too; bullet dat done kilt er man an' dirt all wet wif daid man's blood. Oh, Lawd. Ah hopes t'ain't me she's fixin' ter hoodoo!" Jack-Ambrose might have spared himself incipient nervous prostration, for Mammy Ciss had no thought of him. All afternoon she pottered round her herb garden, toward evening she made a trip to the woods. That night, although the April air was balmy, a great fire blazed on her "herth" and candlelight came from her windows till the stars paled with the coming of the new day. She had killed a "toad-frawg," smeared its little corpse with syrup and laid it on an ant hill. When the little skeleton, looking gruesomely human, had been quite denuded of its flesh she dried it on the hearth until it was as brittle as a bit of chalk, then pounded it to powder in a mortar, mixing ashes of henbane, the scorched leaves of pipissewa and dried root of the dragon's-blood plant with the hones. When all had been reduced to a fine powder she took the cover from a Dutch oven in which the body of a water moccasin had been baking to a state of brittleness and added the snake ashes to the mixture. Last of all she dropped in dried sweet lavender. desiccated rose petals and the leaves of clove-pinks and added oil of lemon grass and powdered orris root. When scrapings from the bullet she had salvaged from the barn wall and a pinch of blood-soaked earth from the barnvard had been added the compound was complcte.

It had a pleasant, rather spicy odor and looked a bit like white corn meal as she measured it into four little pyramids and wrapped each small cone in a heartshaped bag of clean white cotton.

"One," she pronounced as she touched the first sack, "is fo' rememberin', an' two's fo' wishin' vuh could change hit: three's fo' knowin' dat vuh cain't, and fo's fo' knowin' dat hit t'ain't no use." She tucked the little bags into the pocket of her apron and set out for the big house.

Jessica lay in the big tester bed, her head pillowed on one arm. About her face her bronze hair loosened, lay in a warm, sensuous cloud, her lips were lightly parted and on the crescents of dark lashes that curved against her checks there glistened little jewel-like drops of tears. She stirred a little, whimpering like a child who suffers a bad dream, as Mammy Ciss crept into the bedroom, but in a moment she lay quiet and the old woman moved forward from the door. A draft of air would have made more noise on the polished floor than she as she crossed to the linen press and drew its drawers open. One by one she laid the little bags of boodoo powder on the dainty, fragile lingeric that had been made in French convents in days before the war, drawing folds of linen and soft cotton over them.

There was no telltale click as she let herself from the chamber, no board creaked under her as she crept down the stairs; no one saw her as she crossed the fields to her cabin. No one but Tack-Ambrose, who, rising early from dreamtroubled sleep, looked from the dormer window of his attic room. "Oh, Lawdy," he whispered fearfully, "Ol' Mammy Ciss done bin in de big house. Ah sho'nuff hopes she ain't been fixin' ter put no hoodoo on me!"

FOR almost an hour carriages had been coming to St. John's-in-the-Fields.

Varick Place was lined with clegant equipages from fashionable Second Avenue, Bleecher Street and Lafavette Place, the lovely little church that faced on St. John's Park was full almost to overflowing, and still the guests kept coming,

"Who is the bride? Do you know her?" asked Mrs. Schuyler Van Riper behind a discreetly raised fan. "I've heard she was a school ma'am-"

'She taught French in Miss Holdrup's Academy in East Broadway," corrected Mrs. Tandy Nostrand, "I've met her. She's quite charming, Member of an old Virginian family that lost everything in the war, you know, Of course, she isn't wealthy, but she has blood and breeding, and goodness knows Pres Amesbury has plenty for them both with his fine law practice and his father's money-"

"S-s-sh!" interrupted Mrs. Van Riper, for the organ had begun to play and the choir was singing.

The voice that breathed o'er Eden that earliest wedding day.

The primal marriage blessing,

It hath not passed away. . . . Jessica came up the aisle slowly, her eyes demurely downcast underneath her veil, a little smile upon her lips, a slight flush on her cheeks as she heard whispered comments of the women in the pews: "What a lovely gown! . . . Such exquisite taste!" and the frankly spoken verdict of a major of artillery who viewed her through his eyeglass as if she were a filly on display at the Horse Show, "By George, she's captivatin'!"

Prescott met her at the chancel steps, and with her white-gloved fingers resting lightly in the crook of his left elbow they went up into the choir where the rector waited for them, "Dearly beloved, we are gathered together in the sight of God and in the face of this company, . . ." In a few minutes she would be Mrs. Prescott Amesbury, all her poverty and inscurity behind her, safe, sure of the future. . . .

Prescott had made his yows, now the rector prompted her: "I, Jessica, take thee, Prescott . . . from this way forward. . . ." Something seemed the matter with her throat, she couldn't make the words come out.

"From this day forward," repeated the rector, a tolerant little smile on his smooth face. He had seen more than one bride become dumb at the crucial moment

"From this day forward. . . ." The words seemed echoing and reverberating, like a shout in a tunnel "For-

The candles on the altar swayed and reeled. There were eight of them, three each side of the cross, one at each end of the table. Now they esemed to lean to the right, slanting precisely, like muskets on the shoulders of a squad of marching men. Dimly, confusedly, she heard the clergyman: "From this day forward. . . . "

But the phrase did not ring true. What had he said? Not "From this day forward," but, "Squad forward!" The candles seemed to wheel and swing in line, to incline till they pointed straight at her. Candles? Dear God, no! She faced a double row of leveled carbines, and their muzzles converged on her heart, "No-nat" she screamed and tried to hide behind the startled man who stood at her side. "Oh, no!"

Implacably the order came, "Aimfire!"

A dreadful pain ripped through her bosom and she felt herself go stiff in a swift spann, then suddenly an awful swalness flooded through her. Her bouquet of white roses and liles-of-thevalley fell with a flitte that to the red carpet of the chancel. Site was still on the period of the chancel site was still on the period them. The floor second very far away, as if she looked at it from the top of a tall tower, and she knew that in a moment she would erash down to it, falling, falling from a dizag height.
Far she would not feel it when site
far she would not feel it when site gain, a. "

DR. THIEBAULT downed his mug of porter and stared combatively at Drs. Swan and Essary. "It know it's utterly impossible," he agreed, "but just the same, it's so. I saw it myself, and all my class will back me up. I tell you..."
"What's the argument?" demanded Dr.

Matsell as he came through the swinging doors, dropped into the vacant seat beside Essary and pounded on the marble table-top with a quarter to attract the waiter's attention. "Old Thiebault tellin" one of his fairy tales?

"It's so!" Thiebault shot back hotly, "Damnedest thing I ever saw--"

"What was it?" Matsell blew the foam from his schooner and took a Brobdingnagian draught of porter. "Don't keep me waitin', man! The suspense is killin' me."

Thickstalt leaned forward, tapping him upon the arm for emphasis. "I had to dissect the heart for my boys at the college today. The stiff was a foreign one, not a blemish on it. Young female, bout twenty-two or three, I'd judge, and resh as a daily. They must have stolen her from the graveyard the night after the trial. Beascon had opened up the thorax for his class, so all I had to do

"It seemed to me it weighed more than it should, for there was no sign of enlargement, but when I'd laid the pericardium aside and made a section of the organ I saw the reason. There were four bullets in it, one in each ventricle and auricle."

"And no wound in the pericardium?"

"Never mind the history," Dr. Matsell interrupted. "You were tellin' us about this cadaver you worked on today..."

"Precisely. They let me make an autopsy of the executed spy that day. The position of the bullets I found in him was almost exactly like that of those I found in that woman's heart this morning. But, of course, there were gunshot wounds in the poor chap's chest and pericardium. The bullets in this woman's heart had no excuse for bein' there. There was no possible physical way they could have lodged in her heart without rippin' her ehest to ribbons and puncturin' the heart-sac, but-make anything you want to of it!-there they were. I haven't any more idea than you how they got there, but one thing I'm sure of. Death must have been instantaneous."

$\mathbf{F}$ luffy

BY THEODORE STURGEON

Cats know a good deal more than they say. . . .

R ANSOME lay in the dark and smiled to himself, thinking about his hostess. Ransome was always in demand as a house-guest, purely because of his phenonmenal abilities as a raconteur. Said abilities were entirely due to his being so often a house-guest, for it was the terse beauty of his wordpictures of people and their opinion that made him the figure he was. And all those clipped ironies had to do with the people he had met last week-end. Staving a while at the Joneses, he could quietly insinuate the most seandalously hilarious things about the Joneses when he week-ended with the Browns the following fortnight. You think Mr. and Mrs. Jones resented that? Ah, no. You should hear the dirt on the Browns! And so it went, a two-dimensional spiral on the social plane.

This wasn't the Joneses or Brown's, though, This was Mrs. Benedetto's menage; and to Ransome's somewhat jaded sense of humor, the widow Benedetto was a goldsend. She lived in a world of her own, which was apparently set about with quasi-important ancestors and relatives exactly as her livingroom was cluttered up with perfectly unmentionable examples of Victorian rocco.

Mrs. Benedetto did not live alone. Far from it. Her very life, to paraphrase the lady herself, was wound about, was eaught up in, was owned by and dedicated to her baby. Her baby was her beloved, her little beauty, her too darling my dear, and—so help me—her bookly watis-watiskins. In himself he was quite a character. He answered to the name of Bubbles, which was inaccurate and offended his dignity. He had been christened Fluffy, but you know how it is with nickammes. He was large and he was sleek, that paragon among animals, a chastened alley-rabble.

Wonderful things, eats. A cat is the world animal which can the like a parasite and maintain to the utmost its ability to lake care of itself. You've heard of little lost dogs, but you never heard cast don't belong anywhere. You wouldn't, get Mrs. Bendelet to believe that, Mrs. Bendelet onever thought of putting Fulf-get drys. Bendelet to believe that, Mrs. Bendelet onever thought of putting far ten-day moratorism on the test by declaring a ten-day moratorism on the canned also mon. If she lad, she would have uneverved a sense of honor comparable with that of a she long.

Knowing this—Ransome pardoned himself the pur—categorically, Ransome found himself vastly amused. Mrs. Benedetto's ministrations to the pilegment Fluffy were positively orgisate. As he thought of it in detail, he began to feel that perhaps, after all, Fluffy was something of a feline phenomenon. A cat's cars are sensitive organisms; any living being that could abide Mrs. Benedetto's comstant flow of conversation from dawn sleep only to be replaced by a nightshift of resounding snores; well that was phenomenal. And Fluffy had stood it for four years. Cats are not renowned for their patience. They have, however, a very fine sense of values. Fluffy was getting something out of it-worth eonsiderably more to him than the discomforts he endured, too, for no cat likes to break even.

HE LAY still, marvelling at the carrying power of the widow's snores. He knew little of the late Mr. Benedetto, but he gathered now that he had been either a man of saintly patience, a masoehist or a deaf-mute. A noise like that from just one stringy throat must be an impossibility, and yet, there it was. Ransome liked to imagine that the woman had callouses on her palate and tonsils, grown there from her conversation, and it was these rasping together that produced the curious dry-leather quality of her snores. He tucked the idea away for future reference. He might use it next week-end. The snores were hardly the gentlest of lullabys, but any sound is soothing if it is repeated often enough.

There is an old story about a lighthouse tender whose lighthouse was equipned with an automatic cannon which fired every fifteen minutes, day and light, One night, when the old man was fast asleep, the gun failed to go off. Three seconds after its stated time, the old fellow was out of his bed and flailing around the room, shouting, "What was that?" And so it was with Ransome.

He couldn't tell whether it was an hour after he had fallen asleep, or whether he had not fallen asleep at all. But he found himself sitting on the edge of the bed, wide awake, straining every nerve for the source of the-what was it?-sound?-that had awakened him. The old house was as quiet as a city morgue after closing time, and he could see nothing in the tall, dark guest-room but the moon-silvered windows and the thick blacknesses that were drapes. Any old damn thing might be hiding behind those drapes, he thought comfortingly. He edged himself back on the bed and quickly snatched his feet off the floor, Not that anything was under the bed, but still-A white object puffed along the floor through the moonbeams toward him. He to attack or defend, dodge or retreat. Ransome was by no means an admirable character, but he owed his reputation and therefore his existence to this particular trait, the ability to poise himself, invulnerable to surprise. Try arguing with a man like that sometime. The white object paused to stare at him out of its vellow-green eyes. It was only Fluffy-Fluffy looking casual made no sound, but tensed himself, ready and easy-going and not at all in a mood to frighten people. In fact he looked up at Ransome's gradually relaxing bulk and raised a long-bair, quizzical evebrow, as if he rather enjoyed the man's discomfiture. Ransome withstood the cat's gaze with suavity, and stretched himself out on the bed with every bit of Fluffy's own easy grace. "Well," he said amusedly, "You gave me a joit! Weren't you taught to knock before you entered a gentleman's boudoir?" Fluffy raised a velvet pay and touched it pinkly with his tongue. "Do you take me for a barbarian?" he asked. Ransome's lids seemed to get heavy, the only sign he ever gave of being taken aback. He didn't believe for a moment that the eat had really spoken, but there was something about the voice he had heard that was more than a little familiar. This was, of course, someone's idea of a joke.

Good God-it had to be a joke! Well, he had to hear that voice again before he could place it. "You didn't say anything, of course," he told the eat,

"but if you did, what was it?"

"You heard me the first time," said the cat, and jumped up on the foot of his hed. Ransome includ back from the animal. "Yes," he said, "I-thought I did." Where on earth had he heard that voice before? "You know," he said, with an attempt at jocularity, "You should, under these circumstances, have written me a note before you knocked."

"I refuse to be burdened with the socalled social amenities," said Fluffy, His coat was spotlessly clean, and he looked like an advertising photograph for eiderdown, but he began to wash carefully. "I don't like you, Ransome."

"Thanks," chuckled Ransome, surprised. "I don't like you either." "Why?" asked Fluffy.

RANSOME told himself silently that he was damned. He had recognized the eat's voice, and it was a credit to his powers of observation that he had. It was his own voice. He held tight to a mind that would begin to reel on slight provocation, and, as usual when bemused, he flung out a smoke-screen of his own variety of glib chatter.

"Reasons for not liking you," he said, "Are legion. They are all included in the one phrase--'You are a cat'." "I have heard you say that at least twice before," said Fluffy, "Except that you have now substituted 'eat' for 'woman'." "Your attitude is offensive. Is any given truth any the less true for having been uttered more than once?"

"No," said the cat with equanimity. "But it is just that more eliched."

Ransome laughed, "Ouite aside from the fact that you can talk. I find you most refreshing. No one has ever criticized my particular variety of repartee before."

"No one was ever wise to you before," said the cat. "Why don't you like cats?" A question like that was, to Ransome, the pressing of a button which released ordered phrases. "Cats." he said oratorically, "are without doubt the most selfcentred, ungrateful, hypocritical ereatures on this or any other earth. Spawned from a mesalliance between Lilith Fluffy's eyes widened. "Ah! An antiquarian!" he whispered.

and Satan-"

"-they have the worst traits of both, Their best qualities are their beauty of form and of motion, and even these breathe evil. Women are the ficklest of bipeds, but few women are as fickle as, by nature, any eat is. Cats are not true. They are impossibilities, as perfection is impossible. No other living creature moves with utterly perfect grace. Only the dead can so perfectly relax. And nothing-simply nothing at all-transcends a cat's incomparable insincerity."

Fluffy purred. "Pussy! Sit-by-the-fire - and - sing!"

spat Rausome, "Smiling up all toadving and yellow-eyed at bearers of liver and salmon and catnip! Soft little puffball, bundle of joy, playing with a ball on a string; making children elap their soft hands to see you, while your mean little brain is viciously alight with the pictures your play calls up for you. Bite it to make it bleed; hold it till it all but throttles; lay it down and step about it daintily; prod it with a gentle silken paw until it moves again, and then pounce. Clasp it in your talons then, lift it, roll over with it, sink your cruel teeth into it while you pump out its guts with your hind feet. Ball on a string! Playactor!" FLUFFY fawned. "To quote you, that is the prettiest piece of emotional clap-trap that these old cars have ever heard. A triumph in studied spontaneity. A symphony in cynicism. A poem in perception. The unqualified-" Ransome grunted. He deeply resented this flamboyant theft of all his pet phrases, but his lip twiched nevertheless. The cat was indeed an observant animal "-epitome of understatement," Fluffy finished smoothly, "To listen to you, one would think that you would like to slaughter earth's felinity,"

"I would," gritted Ransome,

"It would be a favor to us," said the cat, "We would keep ourselves vastly amused, eluding you and laughing at the effort it cost you. Humans lack imagination." "Superior creature," said Ransome ironically, "Why don't you do away with the human race, if you find us a bore?" "You think we couldn't?" responded Fluffy, "We can outthink, outrun and outbreed your kind. But why should we? As long as you act as you have for these last few thousand years, feeding us, sheltering us and asking nothing from us but our presence for purposes of admiration -why then, you may remain here.

Ransome guffawed, "Nice of you! But listen-stop your bland discussion of the abstract and tell me some things I want to know. How can you talk, and why did you pick me to talk to?" Fluffy settled himself, "I shall answer the question socratically. Socrates was a Greek, and so I shall begin with your last question. What do you do for a living?" "Why I-I have some investments and a small capital, and the interest-" Ransome stopped, for the first time fumbling for words. Fluffy was nodding knowinglv. "All right, all right. Come clean. You can speak freely." Ransome grinned. "Well, if you must know-and you seem to-I am a practically permanent house-guest. I have a considerable fund of stories and a flair for telling them; I look presentable and act as if I were a gentleman, I negotiate, at times, small loans-" "A loan," said Fluffy authoritatively,

"is something one intends to repay." "We'll call them loans," said Ransome airily "Also at one time and another. I exact a reasonable fee for certain services rendered..."

"Blackmail," said the cat.

"Don't be crude. All in all, I find life a comfortable and engrossing thing," "O. E. D.," said Fluffy triumphantly. "You make your living by being scintillant, beautiful to look at. So do I. You help nobody but yourself; you help yourself to anything you want, So do I. No one likes you except those you bleed: everyone admires and envys you. So with me. Get the point?"

"I think so. Cat, you draw a mean parallel. In other words, you consider my behavior catlike," "Precisely," said Fluffy through his amusing."

whiskers, "And that is both why and how I can talk with you. You're so close to the feline in everything you do and tlink; your whole basic philosophy is that of a cat. You have a feline aura about you so intense that it contacts mine; hence we find each other intelligible."

"I don't understand that," said Ransome.

"Neither do I," returned Fluffy. "But there it is. Do you like Mrs. Benedetto?"

"No!" said Ransome immediately and with considerable emphasis. "She is absolutely insufferable. She bores me. She irritates me. She is the only woman in the world who can do both those things to me at the same time. She talks too much. She reads too little. She thinks not at all. Her mind is mysterically hidebound. She has a face like the cover of a book that no one has ever wanted to read. She is built like a pinch-type whiskey bottle that never had any whiskey in it. Her voice is monotonous and unmusical. Her eduction was insufficient, Her family background is mediocre, she can't cook, and she doesn't brush her teeth often enough."

"My, My," said the cat, raising both My paws in surprise. "I detect a ring of sincerity in all that. It pleases me. That is exactly the way I have felt for some years. I have never found fault with her cooking, though; she buys special food for me. I am tired of it. I am tired of the rot an almost unbelievable extent. Almost as much as I hate you." "Me?"

"Of course. You're an imitation. You're a phony. Your birth is against you, Ransome. No animal that sweats that dresses itself in equally phony imitations of the skins of animals, can achieve the status of a cat. You are presumptuous."

"You're not?"

"I am different. I am a cat, and have a right to do as I plcase. I distilked you so intensely when I saw you this evening that I made up my mind to kill you."

"Why didn't you? Why—don't you?"
"I couldn't," said the cat coolly. "Not when you sleep like a cat . . . no, I thought of something far more

"Oh P"
"Oh, yes." Fluffy stretched out a foreleg, extended his claws. Ransome noticed subconsciously how long and strong they seemed. The moon had gone its way, and the room was filling with with slate-gray light.

with slate-gray light.

"What woke you," said the cat, leaping to the window-sill, "just before I came in?"

"I don't know," said Ransome. "Some little noise, I imagine."

"No, indeed," said Fluffy, curling his tail and grinning through his whiskers. "It was the stopping of a noise. Notice how quiet it is?"

It was indeed. There wasn't a sound in the house—oh, yes, now he could hear the plodding footsteps of the maid on her way from the kitchen to Mrs. Benedetto's bedroom, and the soft clink of a teaup. But otherwise—suddenly he had it. "The old horse stopped snoring?"

"She did," said the cat. The door across the hall opened, there was the murmur of the maid's voice, a loud crash, the most horrible scream Ransome had ever heard, pounding footsteps rushing down the hall, a more distant scream, silence. Ransome bounced out of bed. "What the hell-"

"Just the maid," said Fluffy, washing between his toes, but keeping the corners of his eyes on Ransome, "She just found Mrs. Benedetto."

"Found-"

"Yes. I tore her throat out." "Good-God! Why?" Fluffy poised himself on the windowsill. "So you'd be blamed for it," he said, and laughing nastily, he leaped out and disappeared in the gray morning.

On a Weird Planet

By STANTON A. COBLENTZ

They said Inferno was the planet's name,-A waste of sprouting crimson barred with black, Where towers and palisades were sucked by flame, And fields crupted in the red attack.

There, in the rocket-vomiting sooty gloom, Bewildered thousands, frail as ants upturned, Staggered, and ran, and staggered; pitched to doom, Or prayed and muttered while their homesteads burned.

And roar of bombs and mortars jarred the ears, And drone of flying dragons; screams of pain; While fiery whirlwinds tore at all frontiers, And sane men grappled with the clawed insane,

Inferno was the planet's name, they said. Then weird this tale: that under warm blue skies Once children laughed, and lovers merrily wed, And poets, moonstruck, sang of paradise,

The Immortal Lancer

BY ALLISON V. HARDING

There are undreamed of places beyond the grave . . . but those who visit there know no return!

To EPMOND TRILEO, dramatic criticism had provided, if not a complete personal fulfillment or outlet, at least a revenue on life and upon those who were intrinsically finer and more creative than himself. Like a shormoler's awl honed to a fine point in hated, Titlibo's with had been sharpened through the years and stother people's contract, and the properties of the prop

The notorious columnist was a confirmed backetor; as a man, no woman would have wanted him. He was small, bald-headed, middle fortyish but with a premature paunch and a chronic sneer to his thin lips. His eyes might have been described with one word: fishy. His hands were effeminately tiny and the fingers plump.

Of course, as Edinond Trillo, he could have had the pick of actresses, radio and show-business luminaries. As unit ha landful of other influential persons in his profession, the men who decided the people's tastes in entertainment, their likes and dislikes, he must, of secessity, be appeased. Few got on the right side of Trillo. He had no close friends. He was one of those who felt superior to all other mankind and let this fact be known.

Still, the judicious sending of several cases of rare imported wine at the right time by a certain producer would often soften the force with which the Lancer's Point was driven home into said producer's product when opening night came.

It was axiomatic in the trade that the best that could be done as regards Trillob was to neutralize him. You could not really win him over. In over twenty years (for he'd started at the tender age of eventy-six) of twenty-six) of reviewing shows, he had never once been known to give unqualified field praise to actor, actress or the play itself.

It was a fetish with the critic that he abhored amateur theatries and efforts, no matter how sincere.

If they were clumsy and beginnerish.

If they were clumsy and beginnerish, they drew his unstitted fire.

Oldimers along the Main Sem also were of the opinion that Edmond Trillo hit hardest when there was little or no chance of his being hit back. It seemed that he saved his finest and most punishing adjectival phrases for those fresh and enthussistic youngsters who, every year, gain tiny footholds in our theatres and try to win fame for themselves.

His colleagues had long since given up suggesting that at times a sheathing of the Lancer's Point would be more appropriate. There was the instance only a year ago of Hy Gofkin, a small producer and showman, whose theatrical antecedents reached out, truly, into burlesque and vaudeville, but who, at least, attempted sincerely and at the risk of his personal capital to bring the people entertainment

He'd had a great idea last year: "Animated cartoons, you know how they go over," he gestured, "midget and marionette shows. I got somethin' new. None of your slapstick dog acts but a play where dogs actually do some of the acting!"

EDMOND TRILBO had not attended the opening night. There were those who had apparently enjoyed Gofkin's "Canine Capers," though, Trilbo caught the show ten days later, as it had been relegated on his schedule to things "most unimportant." Hy Gofkin professed to be most disinterested in the critic's oninion, but he was visibly nervous that night waiting for the early edition. After all, it was generally known he had sunk all his money into the novel production. Trilbo had been seen sitting in his usual fourth row center scat. Spotters had relayed the disquieting information that he had blown his nose indignantly several times through the first act and had left before the end of the second.

The next day the "Lancer's Point" was particularly sharp. Among other things. Trilbo remarked scathingly, that "Canine Capers" was utterly asinine, that there were surely enough so-called actors and actresses on Broadway of doubtful lineage and antecedents and even worse acting ability to allow an extra room for added "caninity." The rest of the report was even more detrimental to the health of "Canine Capers," He branded those who did go to such a show as fourth-rate heyond-morous: to those who were given ducats to the show or who found themselves there by mistake, his advice was only "to seek refuge in the nearest rest room and to remain there, come what may until all danger was past, i.e., the final curtain had fallen."

"So much," ended Trilbo, "for the bedraggled four-footed thespians of the Pretender Producer, Hy Gofkin, who auparently never got beyond throwing beach balls to seals in vaudeville."

People read the column, and those who had seen "Canine Capers" and enjoyed to laughed guiltily and decided after all it was rather an absurd show and spoke accordingly to their friends. Those who had not seen the play promptly decided not to. Attendance fell off abruptly. Gofkin, after having a ten-days-to-two weeks success on his hands now had a miserable flop-and a great many creditors.

Three weeks after that he hung himself in the basement of his house, a failure and a laughing stock. If anything, the thin corners of Trilbo's mouth that turned expertly into the habitual sneer. lengthened drolly. It was nice to know that you had so much influence over life and other human beings.

That, of course, was a year ago, but it was something that might have happened many times before and would approximately duplicate itself again before Trilbo laid away his lance. For it was on human suffering that the man lived. It was in February that the critic met the Indian. Swami Amend Cohawl was his name and he had something of a renutation as a bona fide mystic. They said he was wealthy beyond counting, and his American wife had drawn him here to the states, although in his manner and outlook you could feel with him always a bit of India.

He had a young daughter, a veritable beauty with the charms of the East and West intermingling. She had wondrous black eyes and high checkbones and a clear voice of the purset quality. She had intense theatrical aspirations and her mother, who knew about these things, realized that it would be best now to vie for and obtain as far as possible Edmond Trilbo's grudging "permission."

I'll SEEMED that Amend Cohawl was interested in a play. Ol course as a vicitie for his daughter. She, which is for his daughter. She, what studied in Indian and American universities, had all the things that Trilibo abnorred: youth, enthusiasm, undoubted manteurishness—and above all, sensitivity, A very sumptuous cockatal party was given, and with it Madame Cohawl and the Swami hoped to launch their daughter on her acting career.

Trilbo came to the cocktail party and was treated in the accustomed manner of a king by his subjects. There were perhaps two exceptions in the circle of his idolizers: young and beautiful Cherice Cohawl and her father, Amend. The girl smiled a small little smile at Trilbo but there was none of her mother's fawning upon the critic. The Indian, himself, was even more reserved. If he, though, was unimpressed by the columnist, the feeling was mutual and Mrs. Cohawl attempted in her extrovertive American way to resolve the unresolvable differencs between the two men. "We're hoping dear," she said to

"We're hoping, dear," she said to Amend, "that Mr. Trilbo will like Cherice in her first play." "Better that Cherice should enjoy herself in her acting than anyone else," stated Amend.

"Ah, that's it," Trilbo was sardonic.

"Perdition to the public in the best tradition of show business."

"Not at all," countered Cohawl in his elipped British University-learned Engish. "There are always some who like and some who do not like any performance or entertainment if they are left to their own devices."

"Hear, hear," sneered Trilbo as Mrs. Cohowl frantically frowned at her husband.

"I would, Sir, I am sure, enjoy your daughter's play more if you were to appear in a turban and levitate a few tables for us off center stage!"

There were thinly disguised guffaws from those of Trilbo's cohorts and toadies standing around. The party broke up as rather a dismal failure, and so the days turned themselves end on end to wards the momentous date of opening.

"O Wondrous Morning" had been selected largely because Cherice liked it. and because she liked it. Amend had put considerable money into it-not that it mattered to him-and its heretofore unknown author became known. If there was neven a pseudo-playwise member of the producing and acting group of "O Wondrous Morning," it might have been Mrs. Cohawl, whose objections to the selected vehicle on strictly realistic and commercial grounds, were overruled by her daughter's enthusiasm and her husband's belief that that very enthusiasm was much more important than anything that might happen at the box office.

AS AMEND had sated many times, in his own India entertainers usually put on their performances free. Their payment was the joy of entertaining and the pleasure of their audience. This American way of judging everything on a critical and commercial basis irked

Amend, but it was a magnificent concession on his part to this arrangement that the night before the initiation of Cherice's play, he had called for and obtained an appointment with Trilbo in the latter's hotel suite.

He arrived punctually at nine p.m., and the two men sat in the critic's heavily ornamented living-room, both somewhat uneasily, Cohawl stiffly and Trilbo slouched exaggeratedly in an overstuffed morris chair "It is about Cherice's play," the Indian came straight to the point.

Edmond inclined his head as though it were new knowledge to him that "O Wondrous Morning" starring Miss Cherice Cohawl was to have its first showing on the morrow.

"It seems," the Swami went on, "that my wife, who knows about these things, says that it is of the utmost importance what you write in your column about my daughter's play, that if you write bad of it, it will be bad; if you write good, it will be good."

"That's something of an oversimplification, but essentially, I can say with due modesty, true, true,"

"I want you to write good of it."

There was silence in the great room, Trilbo eved his man. He was envious of the Indian, of his carriage and height, of his dignified serently and obvious intelligence. When Trilbo envied someone, he hated him, and now this man was coming to him and attempting to dictate what he should write in his column

The Swami went on. He told of his daughter: a lot of irrelevancies, of how hard she had worked and how much she believed and how much she enthused: reasons, all of which, that set Edmond Trilbo's mind more surely. The Swami finally took his leave gracefully, He thanked Trilbo for his time.

There was, the critic noticed, no indication that he would be made a present of some carved ivory statuettes which he had pointedly admired at the Cohawls. The Indian repeated as he was leaving, "I hope you will write only good of the play."

"I shall see it, of course," replied a thoroughly miffed Trilbo, "but I do not expect to be impressed by it." He shut his specially carved oak door.

The journalist sat for a moment at a window overlooking the park. It was cold neither outside nor in here, but he was chilly. He connected it somehow with Cohawl and decided he disliked the man even more than at first note, He went to bed humming pleasantly to himself and looking forward to the morrow and "O Wonderous Morning" which wouldn't be quite so wonderous when he got throw with it in the "Lancer's Point "

THE opening night was typical. The excitement of the cast, the enthusiasm of the crowd, and the reserved attitude of the critics. To be entirely objective, the play was a rather nebulous hodgepodge of irrelevant, even at times, downright inconsequential episodes. It dealt with the dream life of humans and how in the play, one young girl, played by Cherice Cohawl, changed things around so that reality became a dream and her dreams became reality.

It was rather a happy atmosphere but the idea was neither original nor inspiring in its form.

Cherice acted beneath the handicap of a sort of blue-white sheet wrapped around to suggest the ethereal qualities of her dream-world reality. She did her lines creditably, and the audience reaction seemed to signify that they, at least, were passably satisfied. Swami Amend Cohawl, however, seated with Mrs. Cohawl three rows behind Trilho's fourth and center noted that the eritic laughed out loud on several oceasions where no joke was meant, and that this caused those around him who were aware of his identity to titter a bit themselves. Edmond Trilbo walked out in the middle of the third act and that, as ancient showmen along the Main Stem will tell you, was a bad sign. The audience's attitude from then to the end of the play, or at least that in the immediate area of the now-vacated fourth row eenter, became distinctly chilly.

The critic returned to his hotel suite. With the feverish speed of a purposeful man, he uncovered his portable in the den and began to type almost as soon as he'd taken off coat and hat and mixed himself a rye and water. Never had his pointed phrases flowed more freely and never more destructively. His noiseless bumped and vibrated as he went on, pausing only to feed new sheets into the machine. When he was through, he realized he had written the entire "Lancer's Point" column on "O Wondrous Morning" but this was too good an opportunity to miss. He rose and was mixing hunself another rye when the door chimes sounded.

He crossed to the front, frowning the while. Lord, hotel personnel these days! The people downstairs had explicit instructions not to disturb him and certainly to let no one up without first announcing them. He called, "Whose there?"

A voice answered, "Open the door," in unmistakably familiar tones. Almost against his will, yes, in fact, quite against his will, Trilbo grasped the heavy bronze knob and the portal swung inward. The Indian, Cohawl, came in The journalist sputtered with rage,

"What right have you to come up here -I must tell you, sir, that I resent unexpected intrusion by anyone: doubly so by one of your ilk!" The Indian sood there wordlessly, staring at the man, and Trilho noticed suddenly and uncomfortably how large and dark his eyes were. "I suppose," Edmond went on slightly less irritably, "you've come to ask me what I wrote of the play. Perhaps," the sneer again, "you'd like to read my review." He gestured towards his typewriter and the pile of paper beside it.

"No," said Amend slowly. "I can see in your face. I can see it all."

Trilbo rocked back and forth from heel to toe feeling master of the situation again. The Swami went on.

"I am fully aware, Mr. Trilbo, that it would be worthless for me to ask you to relent, to ask you not to drive your lance so deep into the heart of my daughter even when I tell you that to do so will surely ruin a sensitive young girl's life."

"Sir. I cannot be bribed." Edmond puffed. Ethics, they're wonderful!

Without a word the Indian wheeled and strode out of the room in his great black coat, leaving so suddenly and soundlessly that it seemed the next minute as though perhaps he had never been there and there was nothing but the half-opened oak door, a shade flapping somewhere back of him in the apartment, and a strange chilliness in the room and in Trilho's heart

YES, said the wise and the sophisticated and those who, themselves, had been wounded but had lived to turn philosopher, their wounds healed, the "Lancer's Point" had never been driven home more skillfully than in his column on "O Wondrous Morning." Trilbo was certainly at his best. The play idea, he referred to as "an attempt at the ethercal with all the mysticism of a bedpan!"

"The stage lighting," Trilbo claimed, had the garish virtues of the main dining hall of an orphan's home, and the subtle effects reminded of a one-bulb country-station platform." "The actors," Edmond went on, "were of that rare and vicious anomalous class that should not only be seen but also not be heard!" There were others and others of comments. His best thrusts were saved for Cherice Cohawl who uttered the inutterable lines with a variety of tonal qualities ranging from a familiar black face station caller he'd once heard in Chattanoors to the Transcontinental Limited taking a frosty switch on the curve above Sandusky, "Miss Cohawl attired in a faded sheet that surely someone used escaping from the third floor of the Flatiron Building fire of '89, resembles at times a hedraggled fugitive from the Bengal Lancers and one would not be surprised were she to gently lapse into Gunga Din offstage."

Trilbo concluded that "perhaps it would be more within the keeping of the ingenious background to retitle the poor play, 'A Night In a Turkish Bath,' and considering Miss Cohawl's Indian background, she might do a strip tease to the accompaniment of muted castanets" which, Mr. Trilho pronounced, he was ready to supply.

"'O Wondrous Morning' never came," he punctuated, "but lay slaughtered somewhere in a dark, dismal and endless p.m., by an author's ineptitudes and the inescapable amateurishness of its wochegone and sub-vaudeville cast." High noon of the day after the opening night. Trilbo received a call He frowned at the voice. It was Cohawl, What he said was simple. "You shall apologize to my daughter. Mr. Trilbo. You shall beg her forgiveness for what you have written."

Even before the journalist's sputterings and protestations could seek retaliation, a click at the other end told Edmond that the Swami had hung up. He amused himself at the thought that evening of the crest-fallen company. And how dispirited a company can be after such a lambasting as he had meted out! Even the audience is against them.

Trilbo did not know until the next morning when he picked up his paper that there had been no performance. "O Wondrous Morning" was no more, but that was not the main story, and his eyes excitedly took in the details. Miss Cherice Cohawl had committed suicide by hanging herself in a closet of her home shortly before five o'clock. "The body was found by Mrs. Cohawl. Miss Cohawl was featured in a new play which opened last night backed by her father, Amend Cohawl of India "

The Indian, Trilbo knew intuitively, would now certainly be very aunoving. and having all of a bully's cowardice, he thought long and seriously of calling the police, and yet what could he say? He had not been threatened. Still, the press must not be intimidated. He did check with the downstairs desk, though, and again reiterated his instructions that no one, no one, was to be let up without his being notified by house phone and only with his permission.

THE critic's hired man prepared the substitution of the substituti

He sat and stared out over the city and he felt, perhaps with the help of a third glass of heady wine, a sense of remoteness to and yet influence over the city and its teening millions. There was, he was frank enough with himself to admit; it, a sense of satisfaction that he, Edmond Trillo, was so powerful that held the verdict of life and death over some men's pocketbooks, over some men's pocketbooks, over some men's pocketbooks, over some proceeds these procedures are some form panels have some them.

men's ideas, over, even, some men's lives.

That a girl had killed herself, undoubtedly because of his judgment of her acting ability and her play, made one a god sitting aton a cothic Olympus.

It was then that he noised the draft and the chilliness. And then, too, although he was still deeply satisfied by the spread of the city before him, yee yees almost beyond conscious control, slid away from the scene, slid sideways, their corners catching the image of something tall and dark near his chair where something tall and dark should not already some thing tall and dark should not

He jumped from his chair and made the small frightened sound of one who, in a few minutes has been jerked from his shell of sophistication and polish and urban security.

The Indian was standing there looking at him levelly, and Trillo wildly looked at the hands and was glad there was no weapon in them. There seemed no plysical menace about the man, if and and the journalist angrily demanded to know why, for the second time in twenty-four hours, Mr. Cohaw'l had invaded upon lös privacy, this time not only without being announced but without knock-out being announced but without knock-out him to be a second time of the second time of the second time and time

It was too trivial a point just then to wonder how he had gotten in. The Swami stood with folded arms, and perhaps the shadow of his eyes was from the black fedora on his head, or perhaps it was grief. His dark greatooat, overlong as Trilbo had noticed with the fastidiousness of the precisely tailored dandy, had a Dracula-like quality which needed only for props a coach, a castle, and a bat.

Then the critic's arrogant conceit came to his rescue.

"I must ask you to leave immediately, sir, I consider myself a very lenient man not to call the picke now but I sure by shall if you make another one of your precipious appearances. I, uh., "I was a slight concession to the conventional."... I read of othe death of you delayers, I can be shall be sh

An expression crossed the usually expressionless face of Cohawl. It was an expression that Trilbo did not like.

"I did not come here, Edmond Trilbo, to discuss the merits of the situation." The Indian pronounced his words very exactly. "I repeat what I told you earlier before my daughter, as the papers say, took her life, but of course she was dying then of this malady you had stricken her with. I repeat that you shall seek her out and apologize to her. I care little whether the apology is made in this world or the next."

"Are you threatening me?"

50

"You may designate any word you wish to it. I am merely pronouncing sentence on you," the Swami replied.

This man was obviously mad and he was a trouble-maker. Edmond Trilbo had an abnormal for of creates. He'd run across many in his professional life. They were troublesome and they were dangerous and he was of the turn of mind that held there was nothing more precous than his own personal safety and that all aheadd he sacrificed to that. An idea blossomed, grew subflenty big Trilbo backed around to the side of the desk, and beneath the level of its top, edged open a drawer by fingertip. His hand elosed around the butt therein. "I believe you came up here with the idea of killing me," he said, quieter now that the way ahead seemed clear. The Swami stood silently and straight

The Swami stood silently and straig before him.

"That will be taken care of," he replied finally.

It was a more violent thing than Trilbo had ever done in his life before, but it was entirely justified for his welfare and for his peace of mind, and its originality for him held no terrors. It was so like so many plays he'd seen.

He brought the gun up into sight, aimed it at Cohawl and fired. For a moment, the Swami did not move, and there was a frightening instant where Triblo thought madly of the mystic qualities aseribed to these Indians. He pumped another shot for good measure but then saw the spreading red on the man's over-coat.

The Swami slid suddenly to the floor.

It was all very simple. The stage had been perfectly set. He had instructed several times and this afternoon that no one was to be let upstairs. The finding of the Indian unannounced would be sufficient justification.

He picked up the phone, jiggled it. The desk clerk answered. Trilbo pitched his voice high and talked fast.

"For God's sake, get the police! Somebody broke in up here and tried to attack me. I've shot him!"

He hung up and walked gingerly around the side of the desk to where Cohawl lay. Amend's face was still expressionless, the eyes were ojen, but no more than flesh and blood was he, for his color was very poor and his breathing was very Still, there were words, not many of them but a few before those downstairs could rush up to the rescue. Witches words to scare old women, Trilbo told himself afterward.

"I had asked only that you find my daughter and apologize to her, either here or in the hereafter. But there are things worse than life and death, Mr. Trilbo, as you shall have an eternity to find out, and yet your search and your task shall be the same."

With that he died on the elaborately marked carpet that hardly showed where the blood had stained it.

the blood had stained it.

THEY came and took him away and Trilbo aeted very well his surprise at finding who the man was. The police took a policy view of the whole thing. A ment in his limbs. He was not under anesthesia. He was him, himself, Trilho.

He commenced to run. This sinister farce must have a reason and an explanation. A feverial urgency drow with mouvand toward the figure in the distance on the limitless plain. He ran for minutes, many minutes until he was panting like a little dog. Still he drew no nearer to the white-sheeded figure. It remained always exactly the same distance from him.

He screamed then as the first mad conception of his predicament cozed into his consciousness. The paper, the city final cellion, with the date in blade type was his starting point, and She, the image of Cherice across there, across the unattiniable plain was his goal. The ungency to reach her was the whip that drove him on, his purposes forever now. He must follow her and follow her and follow her and follow her point of these was unaccleasness in chasing one whom you can never each across a strange dusty plain that reach across a strange dusty plain that the province medical properties of the precision of the price in the mult dry center of his growing medicals.

For he knew now full well that this was neither Heaven nor Hell . . . but Eternity!

In the next WEIRD TALES - - - -

A galaxy of fine stories and fine authors including

SEABURY QUINN

MANLY BANISTER HAROLD LAWLOR

and others

July WEIRD TALES is out May fifteenth father crazed by the suicide of his actress daughter comes to revenge himself upon the critic who panned her play. No charges were preferred. For a while Trilbo was very cautious.

Some mystical part of him that he shied at and tried to reason over cautioned him to be very careful.

He stayed away from building sites, never walked under ladders, stepped carefully in rainy, slippery weather and told his cab drivers to take it easy.

Still, it was only a little over three months later that in walking to the next corner for a newspaper, it happened.

He had crossed the street and was on the far sidewalk when the shouts of passers-by and the thundering sound of a racing motor caused him to look up from his city final edition.

The truck, obviously out of control, was almost upon him. It too, had mounted the curb and was coming towards him only yards away, like an enraged bull.

Trillo stood and met his fate with no more fear than a man can muster up in two fifths of a second. Clutching the paper in both hands, he faced the inetal monster squarely and was tossed rudely like a dressmaker's dununy into the air for at least thirty feet, to fall there a luddled, noulescript form.

That, as far as Edmund Trilbo was concerned, was the end of his concern for his life, and many was the editorial writer who commented on the strange chain of circumstances, starting with the ill-starred "O Wonderous Mornine."

But there were stranger things in store for Tritbo. It was like waking up after an operation or a very bad, very deep dream. He was on his back, and beneath him was a sort of undistinguishable ground. The remembrance of the truck, of the exploding impact and of the abysmal nothingness that followed was clear within him. Yet this place was no ambulance, no hospital. For a moment, he wondered if he was still in the street, but there were no people and this was not concrete he felt under his fingers.

Trilbo rose then and saw on the ground at his feet the same city final adition he had purchased before. When? Minutes, hours, days before, he did not know. Where he was, was far more of a mystery.

IT WAS a plain that seemed limitless thould have been sky, was should have been sky, was no more than a monotonously perfect degree of light, not bright, not dark, but entirely even, coming from a source which was not apparent.

Trilio picked up the paper, mechanically placing it under his arm. He started to walt, for that seemed the only thing to do. It was an hallucination. He was under ether, perhaps, being operated on, part of his mind in a fantasia. And then ablend of him, he saw something, at first unidentifiable but gradually to his straining eyes it took form and significance to him: a figure swathed in a blue-white goom.

He knew than a terrible fear that gnawed at his small soul. He had a fine tradition of plays, plays that he'd watched and smirked over, plays about death, about waking up and the obsequious treant saying, 'But, sir, you are dead!"

Corn, and yet what was this? He looked at his hands. He pinched himself. There was feeling. There was moveA great pianist must have a great pair of hands. His own or someone else's!

The

Terror in Teakwood

BY HAROLD LAWLOR

THE night of the first day that I worked for him I knew that Ondia Hurok was terrified either of the teakwood easket or its contents. I didn't know why—then. There were a number of things I didn't know that first night, because I leadn't as yet had an opportunity to talk with Leonic.

The thing really began for me with the rapping on my bedroom door at two o'clock in the morning. The knocking wasn't lond, but there was an urgent insistency about it that finally penetrated the uneasy fitful slumber into which I had fallen.

I awoke, but lay there a moment without moving, thinking I'd heard the sound in a dream. The freak March thunderstorm that had blow up at midnight had died by now. But the wind still howled and whistled about the penthouse which Ordia Hurok had leased atop the St. James, so convenient to Aedian Hall just next door on the street level of the same skystrapes.

The rappings came again, rousing me completely.

I stuck my long legs out of bed, shrugged into a robe, and went to the hedroom door, throwing it open to reyeal my new employer, Ondia Hurok, standing just outside in the darkened

And Hurok held the teakwood casket in his hands.

That was the first time I ever saw it uncovered. A lidded, ornately carved box it was, about a foot and a half long by six inches high and wide—in size, not unlike the sort of box you rent in a safety denosit vault.

But for the moment I paid no attention to the easket. And of the horror it contained I hadn't the faintest conception, of course. Good God, how could I have? In this, the fifth decade of the twentieth century?

No. It was the ghastly appearance of the man himself that made me stare. He was in browy white silk pajamas, without a robe-or that it, but was left payable to be provided the silk pajamas. They'd been literally chaved almost either from his body. I say clawed abvisedly from his body. I say clawed abvisedly because his under brown cheat, his hard flat stomach and tanned thighs, were blood-streaked and wetterl-as it from the claws of a venomously angry black leonard.

He was a handsome specimen as he re- stood before me, with a superb physique rok, like a V set on an I. Handsomer by far, certainly, than I. And I wondered again, wincing inwardly, if that was why Leonie had jilted me unceremoniously to marry him so suddenly a month before in Miami.

All this fleetingly while I recovered from my initial amazement. Behind him the apartment was darkened and silent. Of Leonie herself there was no sign.

I found my voice, "What in God's name has happened to you?"

It is difficult, admittedly, to appear debonair while one is nearly naked, but Ondia Hurok managed the feat somehow. But he couldn't hide the sheer stark fear in his black onyx eyes. Nor did he answer me directly.

He said suavely, "I'm sorry to disturb you, Mr. Welch. Or may I call you Giles? And may I ask one very small favor of you?"

He knew damned well be could do both. Held hired me hacht? Though in what capacity I was yet to Though in what capacity I was yet to learn. Lonie's hysterical letter of a week before had told me little or nothing. And genius itself seldom made capianations, I found. At least, I supposed has a senius. Known in Europe as a concert planist, his fame here had been somewhat observed by the war, and America, for the most part, had yet to hear of him.

But I said now, "Of course. Anything. But first let me help you. You've been terribly clawed."

"A few scratches," he said. "They don't matter."

He was lying, and I knew it, despite his casual manner. If the scratches didn't matter, something did. For fear again had licked like a hot flame back of his slanted eyes. HE CAME into my room, and halfclosed the door behind him. He held the black teakwood casket negligently under his left arm, and held out his right hand to me. Resting on the palm of it was a thick golden key, which I immediately assumed fitted the teakwood casket, for the box had an oldfashioned keyhole, shaped like a Moorfashioned keyhole, shaped like a Moorish doorway, edged in the same gold.

"Keep this key for me until morning, will you, Giles? In a safe place, of course. I'll ask for it then."

"Certainly," I agreed. "But I wish you'd let me wash those wounds and apply antiseptic. They look pretty deep to me. I can't understand what—"

He from instantly. "Keep your con-

He froze instantly, "Keep your conjectures to yourself, if you please?"

I stifled a sharp reply. An even temper isn't one of my assets, but I kept my mouth shut—for Leonic's sake, I told myself.

It was almost as if Hurok read her name in my mind. "Oh," he added, at the door, "and not a word of this to Madame Horuk, if you'll be so good. While here, we're occupying separate apartments, and evidently she hasn't heard the—disturbance. I prefer that she should remain in ignorance."

I bowed coldly in assent.

He was gone then, as abruptly as he'd come, leaving me to stare at the white panels on the door he'd closed so softly behind him.

I turned on the hedside lamp and switched off the ceiling light. Then I sat down on the edge of the bed, and stared mystified at the key in my hand.

Why in the name of all that was holy had he left the key with me instead of the casket? When it was so obviously the casket that he feared? I'd seen it at once. Oh, he'd held the coffer carelessly enough under his arm, but all the while he'd talked to me he hadn't been able to help stealing furtive, apprehensive plances at it. It was as if the thing exerted some strange fascination over him, as if he'd been both attracted and repelled at the same time.

I called up a mental picture of the casket as I'd just seen it. A small dull black box, elaborately carved, with a golden Moorish keyhole and fancifully wrought hinges also of gold. It had a foreign look, but surely there was nothing about it intrinsically to cause a man to eye it with such obvious terror, tinged with triumph?

Unless there was something in the

But-what? It had presented no suggestion of great weight as Ondia Hurok had held it so lightly under his arm. No sound had emanated from it, though once I'd imagined I'd heard a faint scratching, so faint that I couldn't be sure.

I shook my head, and shrugged. Placing the thick golden key in the drawer of my night table, I switched off the light and again stretched myself out on the hed.

But not to sleep. To listen instead to the wind sobbing mournfully about the evrie Hurok had rented atop the St. James, And to think longingly of Leonie. And to wonder again and again what ereature on earth or in hell-what manner of thing-had clawed so ferociously the body of Ondia Hurok,

HAD stared unbelievingly at the curt note I'd received the month before from Leonic in Florida.

I married Ondia Hurok, the pianist, vesterday. I'm sorry. Leonie."

"Giles: (it had read)

We had planned to be married in lune. The damned note left me dazed. I don't think it really sank in until I took it to Glocky-Papa Glockstein, under whom both Leonic and I had been studying piano. I took all my troubles to Glocky. He was almost the only father I could ever remember. His glasses slid farther and farther down on his rhombic nose as he read it. "Du lieber Gott!" he muttered at last in stupefaction. "Ondia Hurok! But the liddle Leonie-she was in loff with you, Giles, boy!" "It says here," I said, I guess the sound I made was meant to be a careless laugh, but it was a lousy failure, "Apparently women can switch their affections with all the ease and celerity of a fireman changing his pants."

Glocky laid a hand on my shoulder sadly. "You are bitter, isn't it? You are young, boy, and that is the time when the heart breaks easily, But-another Spring, another pretty face, and the so-broken heart is whole again, not so? Glocky knows"

Ah, well. I wouldn't argue with him. Glocky was so old. If he'd ever known what it was like to be in love, he'd forgotten long ago. But me, I'd love Leonie till I died. I couldn't help myself,

But I only said, "You spoke Ondia Hurok's name as if you'd known him,"

"Long ago, in Wien, when he was young." He thought a moment and said a strange thing then, "I hope, for the sake of the liddle Leonie, that he has changed."

He wouldn't let me question him further

"When the liddle Leonic returns, Papa Glockstein will find out why she married him." "She's coming back?" I hadn't expected that.

Glocky looked surprised. "Why, Giles, haven't you heard? Hurok is to play with the symphony at Acolian next month. So you see, cheer up, Leonie will be back."

I didn't know what good that was going to do me-when she was another man's wife. I told myself bitterly that I never wanted to see or hear from her again. And I hougstly thought that I wouldn't.

RUT just a week before Hurok's scheduled appearance with the symphony orchestra there came that second hysterical letter from Leonie. That letter that made me wonder what was wrong, and what manner of man Leonic had married so hastily.

"I know I've forfeited the right to ask anything of you, ever again. But Giles, don't refuse me. I'm so afraid! And of what-I do not know.

"Listen! Hurok wants to hire a man-I think I know why-I mean, I'm afraid I know why. But I'm pretending to know nothing. A secretary, he says. At my suggestion Hurok is writing to Glocky to recommend someone. Giles, please! Go to Glocky, and apply for the job. Please! "If you get it, we must meet as strangers. There's something wrong with Hurok."

The whole letter sounded unlike her. Leonie had never been a timid sort of person, never one to jump at shadows. But she was certainly afraid of something, or someone.

Naturally I thought it was Hurok, The soreness had worn away a little from the first blow she'd dealt me, and it never occurred to me to ignore her request now, I loved her too deeply, though I was determined never to let her see it. But I lost no time in gettting in touch with Glocky, and applying for the job. I showed him Leonic's letter, and his furry gray eyebrows climbed toward his scalp, "Ah, so. Perhaps Hurok has not changed, then, so very much "

I said impatiently, "Well, what's wrong with the man?"

"He was such a cruel liddle boy, Giles. Ach, Gott, what is the word? Sadistic. yes. Long ago I warned him he would bring bad trouble on himself one day, Perhaps he has at last." But when I met them at the train, everything seemed all right on the sur-was carrying what I now believe was the teakwood casket, wrapped in a canvas cover. He eyed me sharply, then presented Leonie, who was looking Slavie and beautiful in Persian lamb and a shako, her long black bob like a waterfall over her collarless cout Following her instructions, I bowed face. I introduced myself to Hurok, who politely, "Madame Hurok, how do you do ?"

"Mr. Welch." she murmured

But when Hurok had turned to attend to the luggage, she moved a little closer. "Oh, Giles," she said softly. "You cared enough to-" I was determined to be distant, too proud to let her think I still cared, "I can't understand all this mystery," I said. "Your husband only wants a secretary."

She looked hurt at my coldness, "Secretary?" You couldn't call it amusement, that brief smile that twisted her lips. "Bodyguard, you mean."

That startled me, "Who's threatening him?" "I---don't know." But she knew something. There was just the shadow of fear for a minute on her face. Then she said swiftly, "I'll get in touch with you as soon as I can, and we'll talk." And it was that night, while the wind howled and mourned, that Hurok brought me the golden key to the teakwood casket. And the fear was in his face, too, though tinged with a sort of morbid triumph.

CHAPTER II

AFTER I'd showered and dressed in the morning, I started out to find Ondia Hurok. It was high time I was learning just what my duties were to be. I left the room, but before I could pull the door shut behind me, the telephone rang. I re-entered, leaving the door hanging open.

"Hello." I said, picking up the receiver.

There was the sharp intake of breath at the other end. "At the old meeting Hurok will practice place. At noon. till two."

The click of the receiver at the other end of the line, then. But despite the soft, breathless, hurriedness of the anonymous voice. I'd recognized it as she'd know I would. Leonie's,

I was still standing there, the receiver in my hand, when there was a short cough behind me. I turned. Ondia Hurok was standing in the doorway, his eves fixed on me unblinkingly. "That isn't an outside wire," he said, nodding toward the telephone. There was accusation, suspicion, in his voice. "Oh." No one else was in the apartment but Leonie. I thought fast. "Stupid of me. I was trying to get the desk to-to send up eigarettes." "Indeed?" Hurok's eyes shifted to the chest of drawers next to the bathroom door. I followed his glance. The man missed nothing. There was a carton of cigarcttes on top of the chest.

Whatever he thought of my lie, he said nothing further. He just let his silence hang in the air ominously. "I'm ready for work," I said, changing the subject clumsily enough. "I suppose there will be fan mail to answer, as well as other correspondence? Or-just what are my duties to be?"

He waved a hand carelessly, "There's no hurry. In a few days-" He let his voice trail off vaguely. I began to wonder if perhaps Leonie hadn't been right, after all, in saying it wasn't a secretary that her husband wanted.

Hurok went on. "I've come for the key I gave you last night."

"How are you feeling this morn-" "The key, please," he said, effectively stopping my question. He must have been in pain still from that clawing, but he gave no sign of it. I shrugged and turned to the night table, feeling his eyes boring into my back as I did so. Retrieving the key, I handed it to him. And I think I would have risked his anger and questioned him about the teakwood box, then, only he said something else that drove every other consideration from my mind temporarily.

"You knew Madame Hurok before?" he asked sharply. "This was her home

he asked sharp town, I know."

So. He was suspicious already. And I hadn't improved matters with my clumsy lic about the cigarettes.

elumsy lie about the cigarettes.

But I kept my face blank. "No. We'd never met before. After all, the eity is large."

And I looked him right in the eye.

He left then. But whether he believed me or not, I couldn't tell. Mentally I pictured him going through the hall, returning to his room. To open the teakwood easket? To find therein—what?

I didn't know. And Leonie's story was to enlighten me only a very little, and to puzzle me even more.

66THE old meeting place."

I lines where she meant. The balcony tearsons of a downtown department store, cheep and quiet. It seemed strange to see her sitting there on the folder that the strange of the strange of the strange to see her sitting there on the strange to see her sitting there on the strange her there so many times before. And though I told myself I was a fool, still my heart leaped just as gladly at sight of her as it ever had in the past. I honed I didn't show it.

There were a thousand questions I wanted to ask her, but she said, "Please, Giles. After lunch."

So it wasn't until we were having coffee that she said, "It was good of you to come. And to take the job, as I asked."

I treated you so shabbily."

Some devil made me say it. "Well, well. This is news."

Her lashes fell. "I deserved that, I know," she said, low. She looked at me then. "But—what's done is done." She sighed. "I've made a terrible mistake."

There were tears in her eyes. I could no longer pretend indifference. "Leonie, why did you marry him?"

"I-I don't know. Honestly, I don't.

"I—I don't snow. Holestly i don't I think I must have been hypnotized. Hurok was at Annt Flo's when I reached there. Shed pieled him up bened the incommendation of the shed was a shed to recent though also knows nothing about it, really—and shed installed him in the house as a guest, with a Mason and Hamilin for him to practice on. She'd even sound-proofed the room she'd given him, a this request.

first night, and I didn't meet him at all.
But after dinner I was out on the terrace alone. And I could hear him playing through the open window. And, Giles, he was playing—the piano part of Czarnowitz's Seventh Piano Concertor"
She knew I'd be startled, and I was.

"He didn't come down to dinner that

"On a record, you mean?"
"No, no! He was playing it himself."

I looked at her disbelievingly. "You know that's impossible. Nobody could play the Seventh but Czarnowitz himself.

lt's common knowledge."

Leonic nodded. But she persisted in her statement. "He was playing it suner sattement. Tew was paying in weap prehly.

"It's mepossible." I said again. This mean proper all about the tealwood content. I was no meastry but I knew something about music. "Czarnowitz had a phrenoemal handspan. Albomrala, really. Nobody on God's carth ever had a pair of hands like his. Those chords of the Serenth, Leonie! They're impossible to anytody clae.

last year, remember they said the Seventh would never be played again? Sylvia

Satterlee mourned about it three Sundays in a row in the Globe." "I know all that," Leonie said impatiently. "That's why Hurok's playing it dumbfounded me. I just stood there on the terrace, but I'd been transported to another world, really. Presently Hurok came out, and my shadowy figure must have startled him. I told him I was Mrs. Masterson's niece, and he lit his cigarette lighter and held it up so he could see my face

"I suppose there must have been something very near adoration in my eyes, 1 whispered. You were playing it. The Seventh. How?"

"'Ah, you know it can't be played by anyone else,' he said. The lighter was still flaming and I could see his face plainly. The most peculiar expression was on it. A mixture of-of terror and triumph. Yes, that was it. And he laughed softly, 'They said Hurok was not so great as Czarnowitz, the fools, They shall see! But of this, nothing-until after I've played the Seventh in public for the first time. It shall be a little secret between you and me, yes?""

Leonie looked pleadingly across the table at mc. "Perhaps the secret made a sort of-of bond between us. Or perhaps I was just fascinated, mesmerized. I told you I didn't know. But we were married-three days later."

SAID gently, "But there's something elsc.

"You're afraid. Leonie. I can see it." "Ves." she shivered. "It's Hurok, No. no don't look like that. Giles! He hasn't been cruel to mc-yct; though he's insanely icalous and I shouldn't care to anger him. That's why I didn't want him to know that you'd known me before. But-he's afraid, Of Something, And I think I know what it is, He's alternately elated and terrified, until sometimes I wonder if he's quite saue,"

I said nothing.

"Something peculiar happened the third night after we were married," Leonie went on. "I woke up. It must have been about three o'clock in the morning. Something had touched my throat. It was cold and clammy, as if it had come from a tomb. Then it moved up to my face, passed over my features as if striving to recognize them in the dark. I remember screaming then, just once. And I must have fainted immediatcly.

"When I came to, all the lights were on, and Hurok was slapping my face gently to rouse me. I looked around, terrified, but there was no one else in the room. I told Hurok what had hapnened, and he said it must have been a nightmare. He himself, he swore, had noticed nothing.

"But, Giles, he was lying. He knew what had touched me. His face was putty-colored, and great drops of perspiration stood out all over his forehead. He was shaking like a leaf, and though he tried to conceal it from me, I saw that his pajamas were torn as if he'd been struggling violently with someone."

"And he made no further explanation?" I asked, wondering, "None. I pretended to believe him, It seemed-simpler. Besides, there was a terrible expression on his face that forbade further questions. But in the morning there was something else. I went to the closet, and the door was locked. Hurok came upon me struggling with it. Without a word, he took the key of the closet from his pocket, opened it, and came out carrying—a teakwood box."

Ah. The casket again. "I've seen it."

Ah, The ca

"The night before, when well retried," Louis said, "the caselt was lying on the dresser. Hurok always seemed to hate to have it out of his sight. But sometime during the night, he must have got up to lock the casket in the closet. It made me wonder. Why? Was the casket bound up in any way with the existed bound up in any way with the sisted had been a nightnare? I think it was. Because, Giffes, I know this much. Hurok is mortally afraid of that teslewood box?"

It was only then that I told her of the key he'd given me the night before.

But this puzzled her as it had me.
"Why should he give you the key instead of the box, if he were seeking protection from it?"

I didn't know, either. But I told her of the appearance he'd presented when he'd knocked on my door, and the way he'd been horribly clawed.

She nodded. "You see? There's something, or someone, after him."

"But if it's something in the box, why doesn't be get rid of the thing?"

"Because, though he's terrified of it, he loves it, too. It's as if he were chained to it. I've seen him actually oh, gloating is the only word that expresses it. Gloating over that teakwood casket."

"But after the attack on me," Leonie concluded, "Hurok began to speak of hiring a secretary—a male secretary. But I knew in my heart he wanted another man near—as a sort of bodyguard—just in case he losses what little control he has over this thing that menaces him." Well, that could be. It might even explain why he left the key with me, that he might not be tempted to open the box to gloat over its contents. But what in the name of God could the casket contain? A venomous serpent, a blood-thirsty animal? Surely it was too small to hold any animal large enough to wreck such violent damage, such lacerations as I had seen with my own yees on Hurok's tanned body?

And, anyway, would either of these be cause for gloating?

What was this terror—imprisoned in teak?

CHAPTER III

A S LEONIE and I were leaving the tearonom, I noticed a little man with a dark-green hat sitting on one of the red leather benches in the foyer. He held a spread newspaper in front of him, but, somehow, I had the impression he was watching both of us over the top of it.

Downstairs, as we waited for a cab, the little man in the dark-green but was standing at the cigar counter. But when the clerk asked him what he wanted, he shoot his board.

In the cab, I looked back, There was another cab behind us, and I was certain who its occupant would be. We were being followed, and I wondered why. Had Hurok set a watchdog upon us? I resolved to find out without saying anything to Leonie.

In front of the St. James, our cab halted, and I said, "You'd better go in alone."

"I suppose so." She thought I meant for another reason, and I think she really realized for the first time that she was married to another man. For she cried, "Oh. I hate this furtiveness!"

I stayed in the cab while she entered the hotel alone, then I told the cabbie to drive on. I looked through the rear window. The cab behind hesitated for a moment in front of the St. Tames, then came on after mine. I smiled to myself in satisfaction, Two blocks further on, I paid off the driver and left the cab. Under pretense of looking at a display in a men's shop whose window acted as a mirror, I saw the little man in the green hat alight from the cah in which he'd been following.

Satisfied, I walked on, turned a corner, and ducked into a doorway. Presently the plump little figure passed, anxiously looking ahead. I fell into step behind him, caught up to him, and said softly, "You were looking for me?"

He started. But if I'd expected him to attempt escape or denial I was disappointed. He said, instead, "Yes, I was. I want to talk to you. You're connected in some way with the concert pianist, Ondia Hurok?"

He had a faintly foreign accent. I said, "And if I am?"

"Please." He looked around, and saw the door of a tayern a few steps farther on. "Let's go in there where we can talk uninterrupted."

Mystified, I followed at his side, ready to grab him if he attempted to run. But he seemed content with the way things had turned out. We found a table at the back of the place, and when we were settled with beer before us, I said. "Well?"

He looked at me defiantly. "I want my money. The money Hurok promised me"

I'd expected to hear almost anything else. I said, in surprise, "But if Hurok owes you money, why come to me? Why not go directly to him?"

Because the little man was afraidafraid of Ondia Hurok. He wanted his money, but safely, from a go-between. Little by little, under my questioning, his story came out. His name was Stepan Gafke, and he'd been employed as caretaker of a small cemetery near a little town called Mydia, in Poland. One rainy night last fall a tall handsome stranger had approached him in his little cottage. What in all the world, if he could have it, did Gafke most desire, the stranger

Gafke was prompt to answer. "Passage to America, and a little money." He'd lived there once, returning to Po-wanted to know?

land to care for an aging parent since dead. Now, if only some miracle-The stranger had laughed, "Miracles sometimes happen."

A FEW nights later the stranger re-A turned. He dangled a strip of plane tickets before Gafke's eager eyes. All these, and five thousand dollars besides. would be his, if Gafke, on a designated night, were to leave the cemetery gates unlocked, and remain in his cottage with his eyes and his ears closed. The tickets now: the money later.

Gafke had not hesitated for very long. But there had been trouble, great trouble afterward. A vault had been opened during that night, and a body disturbed. Whose body, Gafke had never learned. But the scandal was hushed up so thoroughly, he was sure it had been the corpse of someone very important.

The cemetery authorities had been suspicious of him, and he had fled possible prosecution. And he'd never received the money the stranger had promised him. Only the tickets. They were not enough.

In America he had seen a picture of the tall handsome stranger who'd approached him on that rainy night last fall. The man had been Ondia Hurok. I heard him through, and sat there biting my thumbnail. So Hurok numbered grave-robbing among his other talents? It was preposterous. Why should a man of his standing in the musical world run the risk? And what could be possibly hope to gain by it?

The little man broke into my thoughts. "So you see?" he said childishly, "I want my money, or I'll tell." I don't know whether I really believed his story or not. But one thing was certain-the affair was complicated enough already without Gafke muddling it further. I determined to get rid of him for all time. I laughed aloud, and sneered, "And who would believe you? Your word, against Hurok's?" The little man looked faintly alarmed

"But it's true! It happened in Poland, iust as I said." "Poland is far away." I narrowed my "You know. I think there's a word for what you're trying to do. Blackmail!" Gafke jumped to his feet, "No, no!" "And do you know the penalty for blackmail, in this country?" His jowls were trembling. He couldn't answer. I jerked my head toward the door.

"Beat it." He beat it. I never saw him again.

I waited five minutes, then thoughtfully went back to the St. James. In the lobby, on impulse, I stepped into a phone booth and called Sylvia Satterlee, music critic of the Globe. I'd had an idea, a crazy idea, and there was something I wanted to learn.

CYLVIA remembered me. She was even cordial. She'd ouce been in love with an uncle of mine. But when I told her I was working for

Hurok, she snorted, "Met that lad in Salzburg, before the war," she said crisply, "and confidentially, Giles, he stinks. A rude, ill-mannered, egotistical, fat-headed---" When she paused for breath, I said,

"He's going to play Czarnowitz's Seventh tomorrow night. It's all very hush-hush." I had to hold the receiver away from my ear then till her excited voice died down a little. "He'll be the most colossal flop?" she screamed. "He must be out of his mind to attempt it when failure is certain. No one could play that but Czarny, And did they hate each other's-uh-intestines! Remind me to tell you of their feud sometime. Hurok was insanely jealous of Czarny's great success-I mean, he was really pathological about it, Giles, dear, and-" "There's one thing, Sylvia," I broke in, before this could go on all day, "Can you tell me where Czarnowitz is buried?" "Buried? What a peculiar- But.

wait, just a minute." I waited till her voice came over the wire again. "Giles? Czarny is buried in a little town called Mydia-yes, Mydia-in Poland." I hung up then, and stood there for a minute looking blankly at the telephone.

And I wondered. THAT night the teakwood casket entered the picture again. After calling Sylvia, I hadn't seen Hurok all day. He was in the soundproof studio of the penthouse, alone. He wouldn't permit anyone in the room with him while he was practising. And Leonie had told me at lunch that she would be out with friends for dinner and the theater.

63

But at eleven o'clock as I was preparing for bed, Hurok knocked on my door, and I opened it. He was fully dressed this time, and if he bore fresh sears they were hidden beneath his clothes.

In his two hands, he held the teakwood casket. But he did not speak of it at first.

Instead he said, "You were out this morning, Giles?"
"Yos."

"Yes."

He looked at me. "Madame Hurok was out this morning, too."

His elliptical statements didn't fool me. He was suspicious of both of us, and artfully trying to get me to trap myself. Sometimes a strong attack is the best defense. Remembering this, I said coldly. "Are you suggressing there was "My dear Mr. Weich!" He eyed me blandly. "How could there be? And if there were—it would be very, very sad, wouldn't it? What is mine, I keep."

any connection?"

there were—it would be very, very sad, wouldn't it? What is mine, I keep."

It was a warning. I said nothing. Apparently satisfied that he'd gained his effect. Hurok held out the box.

"Will you keep this for me overnight?" He eyed it strangely, looking barassed tonight rather than terrified. His mouth was beginning to twitch, and inwardly I agreed with Leonie's estimate of the man.

If he wasn't insane, he was certainly emotionally unstable, for his moods seemed to change with the wind.

I took the box from him in silence and put it on top of the dresser, I knew he wouldn't answer any questions I might put to him, questions that were seething within me.

He stood there a moment, a hag-ridden figure if there ever was one. He putte den figure if there ever was one. He pulled a handkerchief from his pocket and wiped his beaded forehead. And he said nervously, "If—if you should notice anything unusual about the teakwood easket, pay no attention. It—it won't mean anything."

He was no sooner gone than I saw the key to the casket on the floor. He must have pulled it from his pocket with the handkerchief and the thick carpet had muffled the sound of its fall. I picked u up, and started to open the door and call after him. But with my hand on the knob, I hesiated. I tented.

I might never have such a chance again. The casket and key might never both be in my possession at one time. Weighing the key in my hand, I went Weighing the key in my hand, I went over to the dresser and put my ear against the teakwood casket. There was no sound from it.

I lifted the casket and shook it slightly. Still no sound. And it was impossible to tell from the weight of the thing whether or not it contained anything.

I was thinking, naturally, in the light of its past performances, that it held a creature of some kind. But if such a creature were in there, it must be either dead or in a comatose condition

I stood there a minute thoughtfully, wondering, weighing the possibilities of what manner of unknown horror I might unleash. Then I put the key in the box and opened it, raising the lid slowly, ready to slam it down at the first hint of danger.

Nothing happened.

I drew a deep breath, boldly threw the lid back, and looked in.

THOUGH the box was not empty, it was an anti-climax of a sort. And my first feeling was one of acute disappointment and let-down.

The teakwood casket was lined with crimson velvet, and on a small pillow of the same velvet rested what appeared to be plaster-of-paris casts of a pair of hands. They extended from a point just above the wrists to the end of the exceedingly long spatulate fingers with their glossy colorless nails. The wrists faced the ends of the box. and the hands themselves were placed one upon the other, much in the same manner in which the hands of a corpsc are disposed

They were pale ivory in color, and I touched them with a tentative forefinger, They were smooth and cold. Curious now. I leaned a little closer. Then, gingerly, I picked one of them up.

Seen closer, in a brighter light, I marvelled at the wonderful work it represented. The ridges in the fingernails, the wrinkles at the knuckles, even the short dark hairs with which the back of the hand was dusted, all were faithfully, miscroscopically, exactly reproduced.

It might almost be the actual hand of a man.

A ND then I jumped, and nearly dropped the thing in my disgust. The story Gafke had told! Of Ondia Hurok. and the disturbed vault in the cemetery at Mydia.

Shuddering a little with revulsion, I replaced the hand in the teakwood casket with the other, shut and locked the lid. not noticing in my disgust that I left the key in the lock.

I knew now. Those abnormally long fingers. These could only be the hands of Vladimir Czarnowitz, cut from his exhumed corose!

It wasn't until I was calmer that I realized nothing was explained, and I was more in the dark than ever. I still thought the casket contained the hands of Czarnowitz, stolen by Hurok to be gloated over in his pathological icalousy But even so-what then had been menacing Hurok? Apparently trying to kill him?

Dead hands?

It was ridiculous, impossible. Some intruder, some living being must be responsible for the attacks on Hurok, Some human being who wanted the teakwood casket and its contents. could be the only possible explanation. A little relieved, I went to bed, I awoke once that night, thinking I heard the sound of scratching. Only half-awake, I pushed myself up on one elbow and listened. The sound was not repeated.

Satisfied, I fell asleep again, innocent of the fury I had unknowingly let loose. Fury, frustated in its real purpose, that was to expend itself savagely on the darkened stage of Acolian Hall, many stories below.

THE next morning—the morning of the day that Ondia Hurok was to play with the symphony orchestrathere was hell to pay. Hans Schiltz, first violinist and concert-master of the orchestra, sent for me. I had met him casually when we'd first arrived. I went down to Aeolian Hall to see what he wanted, wondering not a a little why he had sent for me. He was waiting for me in the little vously back and forth.

green room behind the stage, pacing ner-"You sent for me?" I asked.

"Yes, the strangest thing has happened." He whipped out a handkerehief to wipe his brow, "I'm afraid to let Mr. Hurok know about it. The concert is tonight, and-well, you know these artists. It takes very little to throw them off."

I was completely mystified and must have looked it. For he took my arm, and said, "Come. There's nothing you can do, but I thought someone connected with Hurok ought to sec it." He led me out onto the stage, bare of everything at the moment except the great sprawling black concert grand which Hurok was to play that evening. I took one look, and it was unnecessary for Schiltz to explain himself further,

God only knows who had got at that piano, tearing at it in an insensate fury. But someone certainly had. The strings were ripped entirely from the instrument and lay in eoiled masses on the floor, like the intestines of some disemhowled beast. And the ivory had been stripped from the keys, and great gouges and scratches marred the dull finish of the ebony case.

I could only stand there, my jaw ajar, "That's the way I found it when I arrived this morning," Schiltz said. "It was in perfect condition last night. The question is, who destroyed the thing?" But I said slowly, "You mean, who is determined that Hurok shall not play tonight?" Schiltz stared at me. "Surely you can't believe that's the reason behind this vandalism? Who do you suspect?" I shrugged, and wished I'd kept my mouth shut. "No one in particular." "Anyway," Schiltz said, "if your theory is correct, our unknown vandal failed in his purpose. For the concert will go on tonight as scheduled. I've already ealled Weber and Garst, and they'll get another instrument over here for us in plenty of time. The thing is-I feel it is wiser not to tell Hurok what has happened. No sense upsetting him." I thought it over a moment and nodded agreement.

"The concert is going to be a mess anyway," the little man continued fretfully. "No one can play that damned Seventh. Hurok will only limp through it if he gets through it at all. Bradsky, our conductor, must have been mad to agree to Hurok's proposal to put it on. He regrets it now, all right," "Why?"

"Because," Schiltz said excitedly, "if you can believe it, Hurok has absolutely refused even to rehearse with the orchestra! I tell you, it's unheard of, for orchestra and soloist to go on cold!"

LEFT him there, shaking his head dubiously. And in the elevator, I wondered why Hurok was so unwilling to let anyone hear him play the Seventh before his scheduled appearance tonight -so unwilling, in fact, as to go to the extreme of refusing to rehearse with the very men with whom he was to appear.

Upstairs, I had no sooner left the elevator at the penthouse floor when Hurok rushed at me from nowhere,

"You fool!" he eried. "Where is the key to the teakwood casket?"

"In the box," I answered as calmly as I could. "You dropped it last night, and I picked it up and put it in the lock."

I waited for him to ask me if I'd opened it and seen its contents. But he was too preoccupied with something else. "In the box!" he screamed, as if I'd been unspeakably stupid, "You might have killed me! Look!"

He led me down the hall to the closed door of his bedroom.

Our unknown vandal had been busy up here, too.

The white-painted panels of the door were scratched and gonged down to the bare wood, just as the concert grand in Aeolian Hall had been. "Forget you've seen this." Hurok snarled. "Say nothing to anyone. It's the least you can do for me, after the damage you've already done."

"I don't agree," I said. "I think the thing for us to do is to find out who's doing this damage. Who is making these attacks on you."

"Who?" Hurok looked surprised at first, then, for some unfathomable reason, amused. "Who?"

But his amusement faded fast enough when I said calmly, "I think I know."

The question I'd expected earlier came then. "You opened the teakwood box!"

"Yes," I admitted. "But the one who is making these attacks on you is some-one-someone who-"

He'd recovered himself. The thin smile was again on his lips. "Yes?

"Someone who is seeking," I said boldly, "the thing you stole from the eemetery at Mydia."

For a moment I thought he meant to hit me. His face purpled, and his eyes grew positively maniacal. Then he froze, and his voice was cold and even. "It would be supply the property of the meanth he are all Mr. Welch if you the

and his voice was cold and even. "It would be as well, Mr. Welch, if you did not concern yourself with matters that are none of your business."

He turned then and was off toward

He turned then and was o'll toward my room, and I could do nothing but follow. The door was open, and Hurok rushed in, picking up the teakwood easket still bearing its key. He showed no fear of the thing now. His body was between me and the easket, but I'm sure he opened it. And I'm sure it still contained the hands, for he emitted a grunt of satisfaction.

THEN, without another word, he pushed past me, and I watched him go down the hall toward the studio.

My puzzlement only increased. And it didn't add to my peace of mind to reflect what an unheroic part I was playing in all this. But what could I do? I couldn't fight someone I couldn't put my lands on. Until this mysterious intruder who was terrifying Leonic and Hurok put in an appearance, my hands were tied.

IT_WAS agreed that I was to escort

I Leonie to the concert that evening, occupying seats that had been assigned for Hurok's use through the courtesy of the management.

By seven I was dressed, and went into the living room of the penthouse to wait for Leonie.

But she was already there, in the darkened room lighted by only one or two dim lamps.

"Hello," she said softly as I came in.

She was looking more beautiful than ever in a tight clinging gown of some gold-colored stuff, and the furs she was to wear were tossed in a careless heap on a chair near the door.

I went over and sat down on the sofa beside her, before the dying fire. "Where is your—" I stopped, I couldn't say "husband," not tonight. Not now.

"Where is Hurok?"
"Still dressing, I think. Giles, have you learned anything further about—you learned anything further about about the box?"

I hesitated. After all, why alarm her needlessly? I said nothing about Gafke the open.

or the casket. But I did tell her Hurok was suspicious—of us. She heard me through. Then, "Do you think he's insane?"

I shrupped, "No. That is, not any more than the rest of us. After all, I guess, we're all more or less cracked on one subject, at least."

"Perhaps you're right." She sighed, and looked at me in the dusk. "What's your particular insanity?"

Perhaps she said it idly. Perhaps she'd already guessed that I was still in low with her. I two storture for me being near her like this, smelling the faint fargance of her perhune, knowing I had only to reach out an arm to draw all that sweetness earr. What if she had married somence else? She was mine.
She'd always belonged to me until, in a mount of the she was the she was the she was the she was the she was the she was the she was the she was the she was the she was the she was the she was the she was the she

I said thickly. "My insanity? You. And you know it." She sighed again. And then she was in my arms, and my lips were on hers, and in all the world there might have been only the two of us. We were still pressed close together when the ceiling light clicked on abruptly.

Leonie and I sprang apart. But it was too late. Hurok was standing there watching Hurok was standing there watching us, his face dark with fury. He was in evening clothes, and again the teakwood casket was under his arm.

"So! The strangers who had never met before!" he sneered. The words seemed to choke him. "I've been expecting this."

Leonie said nothing, stiff with surprise. And I, too, stood there silently, guardedly waiting for what was coming next, but glad in my heart that at last But nothing happened. Hurok surprised us. Visibly gaining control of himself, his eyes narrowed thoughtfully, and then he laughed without amusement.

"Later, Giles. Later, dear Leonie. More important business for me is at hand. But after the concert—"

There was menace in his voice, silken as it was. And I knew he would never find it in his heart to forgive us. Or to forget what he'd seen. I'd met egoists like him before, and I knew that once their pride was wounded, their exaggerated sense of possession outraged, theyd stop at nothing to salve their hurts. It only remained to be seen what form his revenge would take. He left then abruptly as he'd come. When he had gone, Leonic moved closer.

to me. "Giles, I'm afraid. There's no telling what he may do."

To comfort her, I pretended to scoff.
"He won't do anything. Leonic, you must leave him in the morning."

"I had meant to, anyway. Giles, I must have been mad to marry him. And now I'm sane! And when I'm free—" She had no need to pursue that thought further. I caught her close again, and longed for the time when it would be like this always.

Do you wonder I had forgotten the teakwood casket completely?

STRANGELY enough, it never occurred to either of us to stay away from the concert. Perhaps we were still so dazed with our new-found happiness that we only went down to the hall like automatons, scarcely knowing what we

that we only went down to the hall like automatons, scarcely knowing what we were doing.

I remember, when we were settled in our seats. I looked around and said, The same thought must have just struck Leonie, for she laughed. "Isn't it crazy? But what does it matter where we are, darling, so long as we're together?"

1 caught her hand and held it, not caring who might sec.

The orchestra was settling itself on the stage, and there was a round of applause when Bradsky, the conductor, made his way to the stand. Silence then, while we all waited for the crowded house to grow quieter. But there was while we all waited for the crowded house to grow quieter. But there was a buzz of excited comment like the droning of bees, and I caught a stifled giggle or two.

Word had spread via the grapevine that Hurok was going to attempt the Seventh, and I think most of the audience had come with the firm expectation of seeing Hurok make a fool of himself. I I knew Sylvia Satterlee, across the aisle, certainly had. For she turned once, and gave me a broad wink.

I smiled faintly, then turned back to keep my eyes glued to the door at the back of the stage through which Hurok would enter.

No matter what my private opinion of the man, at least it must be said that he was a master showman. He kept us waiting for minutes, then dramatically came without haste from the retiring room. Over his evening dothes, he wore a long-flowing searle-timed black cape—a theatrical touch that heightened the importance of his entrance.

His pale face was infinitely cold. He must have known why they'd come, too, for his faint smile and resentful eyes conveyed an indifferent contempt that flicked the audience like a lash.

There was no applause. They resented that look, resented him already. I almost found it in my heart to feel sorry for the man. God, if he failed, they'd tear him apart with their mockery!

He threw the cape from his shoulders carelessly, letting it fall where it would. Then he seated himself, and I think he flexed his hands. We couldn't see, for his back was toward us. A nod to the conductor then, and Bradsky raised his baton, rapped sharply twice.

And the music began.

Three great chords from the piano alone, repeated four times, evoking the memory of tolling Moscow hells. A pause. Then the orchestra joining in pianissimo.

The first two movements went well, as I had known they would, Quiet, flowing, they were not beyond the talents of any well-trained musician. It was the third movement, and the finale, that would be the real test. Hurok was playing well, drawing a fine singing tone from the instrument, limpld as water in a pool.

I closed my eyes, and waited for the third movement. On the retina of my memory I could see those great jagged heartbreaking chords leaping over the white pages of the score.

Poor Hurok! Poor egotistical fool to think he could do it!

And then it came, the dramatic pause, prelude to the third movement. My palms were damp with vicarious nervousness. I couldn't open my eyes. My breath came quicker, raggedly, waiting for Hurok to begin, to falter.

It started. The mood changed abruptly from the previous inovenients. It was wilder, now. The tempo broken, erratie. Barbaric, Slavie, Harsh dissonances that melted, somehow madly, into exotic harmony. I clutched Leonie's hand. My chest was rising and falling. He was doing it! Doing it, by God! The tearing, erashing chords came again and again, while the orchestra scethed and melted above and below them

The finale, now. Sweeping faster and faster, Frenziedly fortissimo. The piano like a great voice crying ecstatically above the other instruments, a legata that flowed like honey. And, at intervals the great chords evoking the bronzethroated bells tolling, tolling with thrilling majesty.

Sylvia Satterlee was leaning forward, staring like a woman demented. Bradsky's face was surple with effort and amazement. Hurok's back was erect, pliant, only his arms flailing the instrument. No wonder Leonic had succumbed to this enchantment!

My eyes jerked open. Across the aisle,

The great Moscow bells tolled again, on a note of unbearable ecstasy. Once, twice, thrice, it was ended. Silence. Silence while Hurok rose, composed, contemptuous, one pale hand still on the piano, It came then, almost unwillingly. The applause. Thunderously, in waves. Hurok didn't acknowledge it. He didn't bow. His eyes only swept the house. But on his face was an expression of such triumph as I have never seen on the face of a human being. Shaken, I looked at Leonic, She was leaning forward, eyes wide, She clutched my hand convulsively, "Look! Look!

Those hands! They aren't-his!" It was a preposterous statement, thought she'd gone mad momentarily.

But I looked. And it was true. The hands at the ends of Hurok's long slender arms weren't the thin tannd hands I remembered These-these were a pale, bleached, almost boneless white, faintly bluish in the glare of the lights lining the proscenium arch. These were-unmistakably, unbelievably-the hands of the teakwood casket!

CHAPTER V

TORN apart emotionally by the music I'd just heard, I couldn't seem to think clearly. Of the hands, I didn't want to think at all. Dear God, madness lay just beyond! There could be no rational explanation for what we'd just seen and heard!

But going up in the elevator to the penthouse I wished heartily I might have gotten Leonic away-now, touight, But a blizzard had blown up, and I knew the other hotels would be full of suburbanites staying the night in town.

Yet what could there possibly be to fear? This nameless menace, this sense of brooding terror. It could be only my imagination playing tricks on me. I was tempted to warn Leonic to lock her door, and deny Hurok admittance, But again I hesitated. And cursed myself for an imaginative, melodramatic fool. Why alarm her unnecessarily? However I determined to be watchful myself. After I donned pajamas, I left my bedroom door open, and sat up in bed reading. It was impossible to sleep in any case, and I meant to stay awake until I was sure Leonic would have no need of me. With the door open, I could hear any sound of a quarrel, any evidence that Hurok was attempting to put into effect the threats he'd mouthed earlier. And I could reach her side quickly enough, if necessary.

But despite my vaunted watchfulness, I never heard Hurok approaching my room on the thick carpet. It was shortly after midnight when I looked up, the corner of my eye just catching the suggestion of a shadow in the doorway.

Hurok was there again, the scarletlined cape still over his shoulders. But the teakwood box was not in evidence, this time. There was an innovation,

He held a revolver in his hand.

My first thought was for Leonic, and my heart leaped in sudden panic. "Leonie!" I said.

His lips smiled thinly. "Madame Hurok is sleeping. I have just come from placing the teakwood casket in her room."

I looked at him in bewilderment.
"The teakwood easket! But what has that—?"

"Never fear, dear Giles. I have every intention of explaining clearly. Oh, most clearly, so that you will not possibly misunderstand the little surprise I have in store for you. For you and Leonie both."

I didn't like the way he was smiling, the way he was gloating over the advantage he held in my ignorance. But I wouldn't let him bait me. I put the book I held down on my knees, and managed to look at him calmly enough.

His smile faded. "What do you know of the cemetery at Mydia? And where did you hear of it?" I hesitated. There seemed nothing to gain by lying. "Gafke told me."

"Ah!" You must know then—or have suspected by now—that the teakwood box contains the hands of Vladimir Campawitz?"

I nodded, "You cut them off, cut them from his dead body." Perhaps if I could goad him, trap him into carelessness. I slid lower in bed, and raised my arms above my head, my hands clutching the corners of the pillow. "It confirms what I've long suspected. You are insane."

His face darkened. "I'm as sane as you are!"

"Insane, For I know why you wanted those hands. Those hands that always made your talent inferior. You wanted them to mock. To gloat over, now that you were greater. For they, you see, were dead."

THE reference to his inferior talent must have infrainted him. He cried, "What do you know, you fool, of the years of heart-breaking work and effort that have goos into my arreer? And Never, they said, would I approach the genius of Vladimir Caranowit? Those houses of Vladimir Caranowit? Those hands of his I Always they mocked me. I drove myself, almost hilled myself, the he might not surpass me too greatly. I held my own, and he hated me for fit. Jatied my, I tell you!"

it, Hated me, I tell you!"

Hurch was choing with canotion, remembered hatrick. "And then, deliberstelly, Camouvitz composed the Seventa, knowing it was impossible of performance by anyone lacking those freakish hands of his, knowing that at last hoshad me stopped forever. Do you code, when he dickl, that I was glad, glad? And that I wanted those helpless, im my possession. I wanted to his—to mock in turn? I wanted then helpless, im my possession. I wanted to whisper to them every night that now
I.—I was greater at last than Caranovitz.
For I was living, and he was dead, a coppes, a nothing, only food for worms."

Hurok's eyes were glittering. I eyed him watchfully. If I could just keep him raving. "So you broke into the vault, stole the hands."

"Yes. Then one night, while I was gleating over the hands, I noticed that they were growing flexible. The discovery excited me. And in jine they grew more and more flexible, even hole, as one would a pair of gloves. That I could not only and I rearred that I could do may as one would a pair of gloves. That I could not only a superior of the property of the propert

Good God! For some time I had considered Hurok mildly insane. But I hadn't thought him a stark, raving lumatic!

"Ah, the sweet irony of it!" he cried.
"Do you see it! At last I should become great—using Czarnowitz' hands!
The very hands that had mocked me so long!"

But the triumph was dying now in his yea, and headithered fear was dasheing, life shook his head dumbly. "Dut while the hands were dooile to my will in the dayrime, I found that at night they be came again the hands of Vhdmiru Carnowire, possessing some strange animation of their own. And they were vengeful hands, I was to learn. Hands thated me still, and sought to destroy me, until I was forced to keep them imprisoned at night in the tealwood caaket.

"They escaped once, frightening Leonie. And here, even with the key in the lock and the box locked, they posessed an abnormal cunning sufficient to permit them to open it from the inside. They escaped again, to claw at and tear and try to mutilate me, so that I had to struggle for my life. It took every atom of my strength to overpower them."

He couldn't be talking rationally. But, good God, if his story were true! The box was now in Leonie's room! I started out of bed, but Hurok waved the gun. "Haste is unnecessary and futile." he said, suave again. "The hands served their purpose tonight. I have no further use for them. Let them perform one last duty. Soon now we should hear Leonie's screams. The sereams of an unfaithful wife. Swect music, Giles."

I TENSED, ready to spring. But it was already too late. It eame, then, Leonic's seream, shrill, ululating, piercing even through the doors that separated us.

Hirrok's head turned involuntarily at the sound, the smile widening wolfishly on his lips. And in that instant, I acted. My hand tightened on the corner of the pillow, and I hurled it at his gun hand. He retained his hold on the revolver, but his hand was swept back by the force with which I'd hurled the pillow.

I leaped. I was on him then. We were struggling, panting, grunting like animals, our breath whistling hoarsely from our lungs.

animals, our breath whistling hoarsely from our lungs.

My left hand caught his gun hand, held it. My right fist connected solidly with his chin. He was down then. And I was running, racing down the dark halls to Leonie's room.

halls to Leonie's room.

Her seream hadn't been repeated. The apartment was ominously, dreadfully quiet. I prayed that I wouldn't be too late. Her door was locked and the hall lights only emphasized the gloom.

Sweat trickled down my sides as I hurled myself at that locked door. It didn't give, I tried again. And again, And on the third try, my lungs laboring desperately, the door burst from its hinges.

At almost the same instant, while I was still fumbling frantically for the light switch, something slithered from the room, down low near the floor. I had only a confused glimpse of whiteness against the dark carpet. A blurred pallor. Then whatever it was, it scuttled, crabfashion, down the darkened hall in the direction from which I'd just come.

I found the light switch at last, pressed it desperately.

Leonie was lying back in her bed, and I thought for one horrified minute-

But she was all right. A swift examination assured me she had only fainted-a faint from which she was already rousing, thank God! She started up with a cry of terror, and I caught her to me

She was shuddering convulsively, "The thing, Giles! The thing from the tomb! It was here again! It touched my

She buried her face against my shoulder, and grew quieter in my arms. I was murmuring to her when I heard it. An hysterical, unintelligible mouthing of words coming from somewhere back there in the darkened apartment, "No. no, no!" I could hear it plainly. Then the hoarse shricks began. I'll remember those animal-like cries forever.

Leonic shuddered, and covered her ears with her hands. I pressed her back gently against the bed, and motioned for her to stay there. Then I turned and ran for the door, down the hallway, back to my room, Fearing what I thought I would find. For I knew now it wasn't Leonic that the thing had been seeking, but another

And I was right. Hurok was there. On the floor of my room. His eyes staring from his purple face, his tongue a swollen, black, monstrous thing between his line. And about his throat, clutched in a relentless grip, were the hands-the hands of Vladimir Czarnowity!

THE EYRIE

(Continued from Page 3) However, in this issue of WEIRD TALES you will notice that we have a slightly smaller total of stories. But we are bringing you three long novelettes, and two other stories not very much shorter. We think the long novelettes are particularly good. One is by the competent Stephen Grendon; another is by Harold Lawlor who can always be counted on to shake a mean bit of horror and fantasy your way. The third is a slightly different type of story for WEIRD TALES by a writer new to this magazine, Eric Frank Russell. We think you'll like it.

So if the balance of this issue seems a bit different, if we seem a little top heavy with long material, its because the "mostest" of you recently have wanted it that way. Let us know your reactions. After all the quickest, easiest and nicest thing we do around here is to contrive to give you just what you want!

Sweets to the Sweet

BY ROBERT BLOCH

RMA didn't look like a witch.

She had small, regular features, a peaches-and-cream complexion, blue eyes and fair, almost ash-blonde hair, Besides, she was only eight years old. "Why does he tease her so?" sobbed Miss Pall, "That's where she got the idea in the first place-because he calls her a little witch." Sam Steever bulked his paunch back into the squeaky swivel chair and folded his hammy hands in his lap. His fat lawyer's mask was immobile, but he was really quite distressed.

Women like Miss Pall should never sob. Their glasses wiggle, their thin noses twitch, their creasy cyclids redden, and their stringy hair becomes disarrayed. "Please, my dear, control yourself," coaxed Sam Steever. "Perhaps if we could just talk this whole thing over sensibly-"

You can't bring up all children the same way. For instance, take a little witch. . . .

"I don't care!" Miss Pall suiffled.
"I'm not going back there again. I can't stand it. There's nothing I can do. The man is your brother, and she's your brother's child. It's not my responsibility. I've tried—"

"Of course you've tried." Sam Steever smiled benignly, as if Miss Pall were foreman of the jury. "I quite understand. But I still don't see why you are so agitated, dear lady."

Miss Pall removed her speciacles and dabbed at her eyes with a floral-print handkerchief, Then she deposited the soggy ball in her purse, snapped the catch, replaced her spectacles, and sat up straight.

"Very well, Mr. Steever," she said.
"I shall do my best to acquaint you with my reasons for quitting your brother's employ."

She suppressed a tardy sniff.

"I came to John Steever two years ago in response to an advertisement for a housekeeper, as you know. When I found that I was to be governess to a motherless six-year-old child, I was at first distressed. I know nothing of the eare of children."

"John had a nurse the first six years,"

Sam Steever nodded. "You know Irma's mother died in childbirth."

"I am aware of that," said Miss Pall, primly. "Naturally, one's heart goes out to a lonely, neglected little girl. And she was so terribly lonely, Mr. Steever if you could have seen her, moping around in the corners of that big, ugly old house—"

"I have seen her," said Sam Steever hastily, hoping to forestall another outburst. "And I-know what you've done for Irma. My brother is inclined to be thoughtless, even a bit selfish at times. He doesn't understand."

"He's cruel," declared Miss Pall, suddenly vehement. "Cruel and wicked. Even if he is your brother, I say he's no fit father for any child. When I came there, her little arms were black and blue from beatings. He used to take a belt—"

"I know. Sometimes I think John never recovered from the shock of Mrs. Steever's death. That's why I was so pleased when you came, dear lady. I thought you might help the situation."

"I tried," Miss Pall whimpered, "Vise I have to the Law to that child in two years, though many's the time your brother has told me to punish her. Give the little witch a beating,' he used to say. That's all she needs—a good thrashing." And then she'd hide behind my back and whisper to me to protect her. But she wouldn't ery, Mr. Steever. Do you know, I've never seen her cry,"

SAM STEEVER felt vaguely irritated and a bit bored. He wished the old hen would get on with it. So he smiled and oozed treacle. "But just what it your problem, dear lady?"

"Everything was all right when I earned there. We got along just splends there. We got along just splends in the three the got along just splends. I started to teach Irma to read—and all the splends in the splends in

I don't know what. And she so sweet and quiet and pretty! "Is it any wonder she read. I used to be that way myself when I was a girl, because—but never mind.

"Still, it was a shock that day I found her looking through the Encyclopedia Britannica. 'What are you reading, Irma?' I asked. She showed me, It was the article on Witchcraft.

"You see what morbid thoughts your brother had inculcated in her poor little head?

head?
"I did my best. I went out and bought ber some toys—she had absolutely nothing, you know, not even a doll. She didn't even know how to play! I tried to get her interested is some of the other little girls in the neighborhood, but it was no use. They didn't understand them. There was no with the present the property of the prop teach her—

"Then I brought her the modelling clay. She liked that. She would spend hours just making faces with clay. For a child of six, Irma displayed real talent.

"We made little dolls together, and I sewed clothes for them. That first year was a happy one, Mr. Steever. Particularly during those months when your brother was away in South America. But this year, when he came back oh. I can't bear to talk about it"

"Please," said Sam Steever. "You must understand. John is not a happy man. The loss of his wife, the decline of his import trade, and his drinking but you know all that."

"All I know is that he hates Irma," snapped Miss Pall, suddenly. "He hates her. He wants her to be bad, so he can whip her. 'If you don't discipline the little witch, I shall, he always says. And then he takes her upstairs and thrashes her with his bet—you must do something, Mr. Stever, or I'll go to the authorities myself."

The crazy old biddy would do that,

The crazy old biddy would do that, Sam Stever thought. Remedy—more treacle. "But about Irma," he persisted. "She's changed, too. Ever since her father returned this year. She won't play with me any more, hardly looks at me. It is as though I failed her, Mr. Steever, in not protecting her from that Steever, in not protecting her from that man. Besides—she thinks she's a witch." Crazy. Stark, staring crazy. Sam Steever creaked upright in his chair.

Steever creaked upright in his chair.

"Oh, you needn't look at me like that, Mr. Steever. She'll tell you so herself and assuaged it with a deprecating nod.

"She told me all right, if her father wants her to be a witch shell be a witch. And she won't play with me, or anyone else, because witches don't play. Last Hallowe'en she wanted me to give her a broomstick. Oh, it would be funny if it weren't so tragic. That child is losing her sanity.

"Just a week ago I thought she'd changed. That's when she asked me to take her to church one Sunday. I want to see the baptism,' she said. Imagine that—an eight-year-old interested in baptism! Reading too much, that's what does it that—an eignt-year-old interested in paptism! Reading too much, that's what does it.

"Well, we went to church and she was as sweet as can be, wearing her new blue dress and holding my hand. I was proud of her, Mr. Steever, really proud. "But after that, she went right back into her shell. Reading around the house, running through the yard at twilight and talking to herself.

"Perhaps it's because your brother wouldn't bring her a kitten. She was pestering him for a black eat, and he asked why, and she said, 'Because witches always have black cats.' Then he took her upstairs.

"I can't stop him, you know. He beat her again the night the power failed and we couldn't find the candles. He said she'd stolen them. Imagine that-accusing an eight-year-old child of stealing candles!

"That was the beginning of the end, Then today, when he found his hairbrush missing-"

"You say he beat her with his hairbrush?"

"Yes. She admitted having stolen it. Said she wanted it for her doll."

"But didn't you say she has no dolls?" "She made one. At least I think she did. I've never seen it-she won't show us anything any more; won't talk to us at table, just impossible to handle her.

"But this doll she made-it's a small one, I know, because at times she carries it tucked under her arm. She talks to it and nots it, but she won't show it to me or to him. He asked her about the hairbrush and she said she took it for the doll. "Your brother flew into a terrible rage -he'd been drinking in his room again all morning; oh, don't think I don't know it !-- and she just smiled and said he could have it now. She went over to her bureau and handed it to him. She hadn't harmed it in the least; some of the hair from his head was still in it. I noticed, "But he snatched it up, and then he started to strike her about the shoulders with it, and he twisted her arm and then he-"

Miss Pall huddled in her chair and summoned great racking sobs from her thin chest.

Sam Steever natted her shoulder, fussing about her like an elephant over a wounded canary.

"That's all, Mr. Steever, I came right to you. I'm not even going back to that house to get my things. I can't stand any more-the way he beat her-and the way she didn't cry, just giggled and giggled and giggled-sometimes I think she is a witch-that he made her into a witch-"

CHAPTER II

CAM STEEVER picked up the phone. The ringing had broken the relief of silence after Miss Pall's hasty departure.

"Hello-that you, Sani?"

He recognized his brother's voice, somewhat the worse for drink.

"Yes, John." "I suppose the old bat came running straight to you to shoot her mouth off."

"If you mean Miss Pall, I've seen her, yes."

"Pav no attention. I can explain everything." "Do you want me to stop in? I haven't paid you a visit in months." "Well-not right now. Got an appointment with the doctor this evening,"

"Something wrong?"

"Pain in my arm. Rheumatism or something. Getting a little diathermy. But I'll call you tomorrow."

"Right." But John Steever did not call the next day. About supper time, Sam called Surprisingly enough, Irma answered the phone. Her thin, squeaky little voice sounded faintly in Sam's ears.

"Daddy's upstairs sleeping. He's been sick."

"His back now. He has to go to the doctor again in a little while."

doctor again in a little while."

"Tell him I'll eall tomorrow, then.
Uh-everything all right, Irma? I mean,

don't you miss Miss Pall?"
"No. I'm glad she went away. She's stupid."

"Oh. Yes, I see. But you phone me if you want anything. And I hope your daddy's better."

"Yes. So do I," said Irma, and then she began to giggle, and then she hung up.

There was no giggling the following afternoon when John Steever called Sam at the office. His voice was sober—with the sharp sobriety of pain.

"Sam-for God's sake, get over here.

Something's happening to me!"

"There's a client in the office, but I'll get rid of him. Say, wait a minute. Why don't you call the doctor?" "That quack can't help me. He gave me diathermy for my arm and yesterday he did the same thing for my back." "Didn't it help?"

"The pain went away, yes. But it's back now. I feel—like I was being crushed. Squeezed, here in the chest. I ean't breathe."

"Sounds like pleurisy."

"It isn't pleurisy. He examined me. Said I was sound as a dollar. No, there's nothing organically wrong. And I could not tell him the real cause."

"Real cause?"

"Yes. The pins. The pins that little fiend is sticking into the doll she made. Into the arm, the back. And now heaven only knows how she's causing this."

"John, you musn't--"
"Oh, what's the use of talking? It's the doll all right, the one she made with the candle-wax and the hair from my brush. Oh—it hurts to talk—that eursed little witch! Hurry, Sam. Promise me you'll do something—anything—get that doll from her—get that doll—"

CHAPTER III LIALF an hour later, at four-thirty,

Sam Steever entered his brother's house.

Irma opened the door.

It gave Sam a shock to see her standing there, smilling and unperturbed, pale blonde hair brushed immaculately back from the rosy oval of her face. She looked just like a little doll. A little doll—

"Hello, Uncle Sam."

"Hello, Irma. Your daddy called me, did he tell you? He said he wasn't feeling well--"

"I know. But he's all right now, He's sleeping."

Something happened to Sam Steever; a drop of ice-water trickled down his a drop of ice-water trickled down his spine. "Sleeping?" he croaked. "Upstairs?"

Before she opened her mouth to answer he was bounding up the steps to the second floor, striding down the hall to John's bedroom.

John lay on the bed. He was askeen.

John lay on the bed. He was askep, and only askep. Sam Steever noted the regular rise and fall of his chest as he breathed. His face was ealm, relaxed.

Then the drop of ice-water evaporated, and Sam could afford to smile and murmur, "Nonsense," under his breath as he turned away.

As he went downstairs he hastily improvised plans. A six-month vacation for his brother; avoid calling it a "cure." An orbianage for Irma; give her a chance to get away from this morbid old house. . . .

He paused halfway down the stairs. Peering over the banister through the twilight he saw Irma on the sofa, cuddled up like a little white hall. She was talking to something she cradled in her arms, rocking it to and fro.

Then there was a doll, after all,

Sam Steever tiptoed very quietly down the stairs and walked over to Irma.

"Hello." he said. She jumped. Both arms rose to cover completely whatever it was she had been fondling. She squeezed it tightly, Sam Steever thought of a doll being squeezed across the chest-"Daddy's better now, isn't he?" lisped

Irma.

"Yes, much better." "I knew he would be."

"But I'm afraid he's going to have to go away for a rest. A long rest." A smile flittered through the mask,

"Good," said Irma. "Of course." Sam went on, "you couldn't stay here all alone. I was wondering-maybe we could send you off to school, or to some kind of a home-"

Irma giggle. "Oh, you needn't worry about me," she said. She shifted about on the sofa as Sam sat down, then sprang up quickly as he came close to her.

TTER arms shifted with the movement, and Sam Steever saw a pair of tiny legs dangling down below her elbow. There were trousers on the legs, and little bits of leather for shoes. "What's that you have, Irma?" he asked. "Is it a doll?" He extended his hand. She pulled it back.

"You can't see it." she said. "But I want to. Miss Pall said you made such lovely ones," "Miss Pall is stupid. So are you. Go away." "Please, Irma, Let me see it."

But even as he spoke, Sam Steever was staring at the top of the doll, momentarily revealed, when she backed away. It was a head all right with wisps of hair over a white face. Dusk dimmed the features, but Sam recognized the eyes, the nose, the chin-

He could keep up the pretense no longer.

"Give me that doll, Irma!" he snapped. "I know what it is, I know who it is-" For an instant the mask slipped from Irma's face, and Sam Steever stared into naked fear.

She knew. She knew he knew. Then, just as quickly, the mask was replaced. Irma was only a sweet, spoiled, stubborn little girl as she shook her head merrily and smiled with impish mischief in her eyes. "Oh, Uncle Sam," she gigwled, "You're so silly! Why this isn't a real doll." Irma giggled once more, raising the figure as she spoke. "Why, it's only-candy!" Irma said. "Candy?" Irma nodded. Then, very swiftly, she slipped the tiny head of the image into her mouth.

And bit it off.

There was a single piercing scream from upstairs. As Sam Steever turned and ran up the steps, little Irma, still gravely munching, skipped out of the front door and into the night beyond,

Venturer of the Martian Mimics

BY ERIC FRANK RUSSELL

CHAPTER I

THE only certain feature was that the vessel in which he came resembled a huge opelsecent egg. Even the egg was of indeterminate hue; its surface was a welrd, shifting mixture of lights and sladows, gleans and evasions and flexing darknesses that danced and bended and swired into oneness with the sooty clouds, the lowering sky, and the external voil that had belehed this cursed thing forth. But, in shape, it was an egg.

From this mystic ovoid crept a thing that might have been an iridescent python, if for the space of a single minute it had been content to remain an iridescent python. It was not as simple to identify. Fixation of contours or permanency of form was no characteristic of this alien newconer which may have been made of the very stuff of thought. Its changes had the sharpness and rapidity of a purely mental process.

It spurted from the cgg in a long, writhing column wrought from the flames of hell. Then it looped upon itself with the disgusting sinuosity of a mutilated worm, turned from a fiery red to a deep, morbid blue, became a relatively tranquil but still ominous ring of azure. Came a moment of quiescence during which strange, extra-mundane senses probed the surroundings with what might have been surprise, interest, or cold speculation.

That condition lasted exactly twenty seconds and not one instant more. The glassty glowing ring shrank in its horizontal plane, swelled in the vertical bloomed to a ball of pale yellow moonshipe practically invisible in the strong light of day. Then, with shocking vim, it popped into nothingness, leaving a blasphenous vacancy in the maw of the cosmos. But below its former place tood a small flowering shrub—a shrub that had not been there before.

To one side a fascinated rabbit, sole witness of the whole amazing performance, crouched stiff and still in thrall of intense fear. As if deliberately to boost its terror to the very verge of death, the shrub squirmed grotesquely, sucked in leaves and branches into itself, reduced and lumped itself until it had assumed the share, form and all the fine details of another rabbit. It bounced across to the terrified watcher, nosed its paralyzed body contemptionsly then shot into the shadow of the egg.

Like the instrument of some unearthly super-magician, the imitation rabbit changed again. First it was there, sitting upright, front paws dangling, long ears erect. Next it had flashed back to the shape of the fiery invader which originally had dominated the scene.

Disregarding the world around him, Spiro the Spy, chosen venturer of the martian Mimics, made a sinuous motion, thrust a fine, scintillating fiber into the egg, felt delicately around, then withdrew. He waited a moment. The egg trembled. Weird shadows on its surface rioted fantastically. Then the alien vessel boosted itself skyward at tremendous speed and in complete silence. A tall, gyrating pillar of leaves and dust climbed in its wake, was easily outdistanced, collapsed back to earth as the egg smacked a hole through the clouds.

The hellish passenger it had borne twisted upon himself a couple of times, glowed and sparkled with feral luster, then writhed away. Twenty minutes after he had gone, the fascinated rabbit shuddered from nose to tail, pated the ground with a weak, still-numb paw. A little later it managed a climsy hop.

OLD JOSH HAWKINS rumbled, "Hey! Cm here, Soldier!" Soldier prompty abandoned his quest for beautiful smells, trotted the correct one yard behind Old Josh's worn and dirty pants. The pair went through the gate and into the field.

Wrinkling his aged, watery eyes, Old

Josh looked at the sheep. He fumbled in a pocket, drew out a large, crimson handkerchief ornamented with white polka dots, wiped his eyes, blew his nose loudly. Soldier sat down, lolled his tongue, stared upward with questioning gaze. Old Josh had another and clearer look at the sheep. "Something wrong with them wootles."

he asserted.

"Yuff!" commented Soldier, moderating his voice in manner becoming to his

To the eye of anyone who wouldn't know a tup lamb from any other kind of lamb, there was nothing the matter with the sheep. It was merely that the flock had clustered tightly and fearfully into the farther angle of the field, the biggest and strongest animals on the outside, the lambs and bearing ewes penned between them and the two lines of fence forming the corner. It was an old technique developed when flocks were circled in the night by things that slavered.

One sheep, either abnormally stupid or unusually individualistic, isodo apart from the flock. It was halfway up the did, watching the arrivals. Down in that distant corner the hreddled mass also watched with histoic but anxious eyes. There came to the ears of Old Josh a chorus of appealing bleats ranging from adult basses to the weal, faltering meetings of the lambs. He knew sheep with the thoroughness of one who has a stank the contract of them there sixty years come Thanking the contract of them there sixty years come Thanking the contract of the con

All the same, that one, lone animal trirated him. Its very alsofness plucked at his sheep-sensitive nerves, Perhaps deep within his wool-coarded mind stirred the ancient quales of his animal-mastering ancestors; life fear that some day their mastery might prove incomplete, might be challenged. Or maybe he sensed intended and the softiary animal's independent stance a suddon defiance of the age-old herd in-stiret, of human overlordship, of Soldier, and of himself. So he pointed a loady had said adopt frages at the along that here will be said adopt frages at the along that the said had been said to be said as the said of the said had been said to be said as for the said to be said as the said of the said had been said to be said

Soldier responded with the swiftness of a perfectly controlled automaton. Muzele forward, cars back, eyes fixed on the object of his attention with almost hyp-notic intensity, he slid forward belly-low in the grass. The dog was far too old a land to rush forward barking. The proper way is to slide wolfshally around and intimidate. Soldier proceeded to hand out some suitable intimidation out some suitable intimidation.

station

The sheep said, "Bah!"
Södier stopped his forward snaking,
His ruff stood up as a furry collar. His stard straight into eyes that were not like the inane eyes of the flock and saw therein a certain something that had been seen by nothing on Earth excepting one helpless rabbit. He commenced to back away, his beseeching whine reaching Old Josh in canine protest.

"Dang it!" swore Old Josh. "Everything's just plain cussed this day!" Thrusting two fingers into his mouth, he tried to drive the dog into action by sheer power of his commanding whistle.

The shrill, authoritative sound screamcd across the fill and wailed away down the valley. Soldier half yelped, half whined. His body hunched curiously as his rear portion obediently tried to slink forward while his front insisted on going back. The distant flock bawled and mewed and shuffled agitatedly. The single sheep stood its ground and glare.

Old Josh took one impatient step forward. The lone sheep took three. Then Old Josh decided he really did need those glasses he'd been thinking of getting for the last ten years. The danged animal wasn't a sheep at all. It was a dog, a strange dog, and the very twin of Soldier. No wonder the latter had behaved so meerly.

haved so queerly. But Soldier's sharp mind worked differently. He'd been about to discipline something posing as a sheep when the thing had changed into the likeness of another dog—and both had eyes of fire drawn from a source untitibiable. Soldier water of the different soldier water of the rander for the order of his going. He departed with extreme alactity, his frantic feet touching the ground at threeyard intervals. A hole in the fence marked his exit. Old Josh gaped at the hole. The hole gaped back at Old Josh. Then he did something he'd never done these sixty years, whether Thanksgiving were coming or not—he deserted his jittery sheep. Taking one horrified look at the dreadful eyes, he turned and ran.

The thing followed lim. He looked back, saw it slong out through the gate and along the road. Cold perspiration ran down his spine as he pricted along at the best pace his old legs could make. His breath came in whevey gasps while in his mind still stood those vampire eyes which seemed to birst for the substance of his very soal. He took another wild glane over his shoulder, saw his tracker maintaining its distance, Dog-like, the thing loled its tongue, but the crimono organ licked out with the length and brilliance of a devouring flane.

Squirming and yelping in his frantic eagerness to get inside, Soldier was waiting at the cottage door. When Old Josh reached and opened it, Soldier dived through the gap, sought the farthest and darkest corner of the room, tried to imbed himself in the wall. From somewhere out back, Tinker and Tailor moaned in horrid chorus.

The dog that wasn't a dog now stood in the gateway staring toward the open door. Old Josh decided there was no time to get around the back and unleash Tinker and Tailor. With his rheumy eyes intent upon the thing in the path, Old Josh cautiously felt behind the door, got his shaking hand on cold metal.

In one swift movement, he stuck his shotgun through the gap of the doorway and let go with both barrels. The heavy charges of buckshot went down the path on a wave of thunder that drowned the any good; in that brief instant after he'd fired he'd seen that the path and the gateway were empty and that there wasn't anything at all where there had ought to have been the body of a dead dog.

With the reloaded gun in his hand, he went around and made sure that all the windows were fastened securely on the inside. Then he poked up the fire, treated himself to a stiff shot of corn, sat down to think things over. He'd been thinking them over for half an hour when, out back, Tinker and Tailor screamed together. He'd never heard a dog scream before. It was a godawful sound, He had to take Soldier in his lap and nurse him back to sanity.

Tinker and Tailor were quiet after that. Old Josh wondered why they were so silent. He sniffed, fancied he could smell scorched hair. Something padded softly past the pearest window, below the level of the sill, where he couldn't see it. Soldier went nuts again.

THE fire was still blazing, and the corn half consumed, when daylight faded, Old Josh picked up the gun, went to a window, gazed into gathering twilight. He was slightly drunk and mumbled steadily to himself in a dull monotone. He saw nothing weaving in the evening mists outside; no shape of menace, no formless fantasm lusting to add his divine spark to its own diabolical fire. He pulled the shades, lit the oil-lamp, had a good drag at the corn jug.

Three hours of silence and much potent alcohol had eased his fears to some extent. He was, he solemnly reflected, getting old. He'd lived by himself too long and had become queer. Maybe if he'd married the Widow Jenson he'd not have been chased around by figments of his own imagination. He dozed before the bright, warm fire. At one moment. Soldier groaned and Old Josh automatically snatched at his gun. But he was only half awake, and his hand soon relaxed its hold. Outside, a ghastly moon climbed into the ragged sky.

83

He was sound asleep when a thin line of peculiar, flickering light seeped through the narrow gap between the bottom of the door and the stone step. The light waxed stronger, glowing and fattening as if it were creeping in with the silent, secretive flow of some phosphorescent liquid.

The invading luminescence had become a purple puddle, humping itself toward globulousness, when Soldier opened an eye and saw it. He moaned softly, tried to move, failed. The fearsome globule flicked out an immaterial tentacle and silenced him forever. The dog rolled onto its side, all four legs twitching spasmodically, a thin whiff of burned hair rising from its carcase.

Old Josh knew nothing of this. He had always been a noisy sleeper and now was excelling himself. With eyes closed and mouth open, he gasped, swallowed, mumbled and snorted before the fire whose crackling embers had lulled him into unconsciousness. Now and again his legs jerked, his hands gestured, as if such futile motions served to emphasize the unspoken sentiments of his dreams.

It was a bad dream he was having, And a startlingly vivid dream, A veritable nightmare that beaded his back with sweat. In the depth of his slumbers it seemed to him that something had occupied the opposite chair. He wasn't sure whether it was Soldier, a sheep, or a rabbit. Now it shone blindingly, shifted identities, and became a caricature of have seen him since ther himself. Whatever the thing was, it settled in the chair, laughed in a chilly, pseudo-human voice, and proceeded to excamine him. Old Josh strongly resented the persistent questioning, but from this person of the persistent questioning, but only a saking the most idiotic questions about it. The inexonable voice went on and asking the most idiotic questions about the most commonplace things, and that Old Josh could do was answer to the best of his ability.

84

For what purposes were alseep used? Could many other animals be domesticated? Were any animals intelligent? Why did Old Josh wear clothes? What was the weapon with which he had bloom some absurd pellets of lead down the garden path? What other kinds of weapons were in general use? Was he of average intelligence, would be a severage intelligence, with the country of methods of illumination better than the crude lamp he was using? Electricity ... alt. ... was that used for any purpose other than illumination?

Thus it went on. He struggled against

Thus it went on. He struggled against it. He disliked this sardonic treatment of an education that wasn't as good as it might have been. He objected to being treated like a child's primer, to be opened and read for the sake of some kindergarten knowledge. Finally, he resented the downright foolishness of some of the questions, the answers to which every-body knew.

"Dogs dislike cats-what are cats?"

CHAPTER II

THE doctor looked down at the body of Old Josh Hawkins and said, "I don't care if a thousand people claim to have seen him since then. I say he died about two o'clock this morning and that his death was from natural causes." He glanced at his watch. "He's been dead about fourteen hours."

Police Officer Kelly felt far from satisfied. There was nothing surprising about the old sheepman's demise, especially when you considered his age. But there were one or two strange features about the case that needed clearing up before it could be considered nest and tidy. Kelly liked his jobs to be neat. In addition to which, he was and always had been a very susoicious mad been a very susoicious mad had been a very susoicious mad

"But look here, Dector Lanigan," he protested. "Jeff Anderson swears he saw Old Josh waiting for the first bus out of the village at seven-thirty this morning. Three people say they saw Old Josh getting of the bus at the depot at seven-fifty. A few more say they noticed thin wandering around. They noticed the same that the same at visitor whord meer seen the place trangely. He was looking around like a visitor whord meer seen the place fore, and when a couple of them spoke to him he wouldfur answer."

"Two o'clock," declared Doctor Lani-

"If he got a lift back here, or even if he walked, he must have been alive around eight to have reached home again."

gan stubbornly.

"He was dead long before then," asserted the medico, flatly, "The evidence puts it beyond dispute." He closed his bag with the air of one whose position is unassailable, "And let me tell you, Kelly, corpses don't go gallivantin around and catching buses."

"Let me ride down to the village with you," requested Kelly. "There's something fishy somewhere, I'm going to ask some questions." He heaved his heavy frame into the doctor's car, and added, "Why should Josh's three dogs have popped off with him? Did they die around two o'clock? Heek of a coincidence. isn't it?"

"You'll have to get a vet to examine them," said Lanigan. "I admit that it's very strate that the dogs should have died too. Jaybe Josh went queer at the end, and traished them off himself."

"I'll get a vet all right!" growled

Kelly.

THEY sped down to the village, the doctor silent and certain, the police officer surly and dissatisfied. As they were passing the tiny post office, Kelly let out a yell, waved frantically to an ambling pedestrian. Doctor Lanigan braked his car to a stop.

"Jeff," said Kelly, as the walker came up, "tell the doctor what time you last saw Old Man Hawkins."

"I told you once." Jeff Anderson's frown showed that already he was sick of the subject. "It was seven-thirty. He had a date with the first bus."

"Impossible!" Lanigan snapped.

"And for why?" demanded Anderson, his frown changing to a scowl.

"He was dead, What's more, he'd been

"He was dead. What's more, he'd been dead several hours."

"That's what you think," said Anderson succintly. "I saw him, the whole medical profession notwithstanding!" And with that shot, he turned to go.

It was the doctor's turn to scowl. Police Officer Kelly chewed his bottom lip and looked bothered. The pair stared at each other.

"Say, Jeff, did Old Hawkins look any different from usual?"

terf lounged back, considered a mom-ment, said, "Only that his face fungus was vellow."

"Yellow!" ejaculated Lanigan. "What color is it usually."

"Brown," answered Ieff Anderson.

"A dirty, terbaceery brown." He swivelled on one heel, made off with an air of finality.

Again the pair in the car gaped at each other. Utter bafflement showed on both men's faces.

After a while, Kelly remarked slowly and thoughtfully, "Jeff's no speech-maker, but he's got good, sharp eyes. If he says they were yellow, then they were vellow."

"Well?"

"And the bush on Josh's dead face was stained a nice, ripe, fruity brown. You saw those whiskers yourself!"

Lanigan began to breathe words in a soft, low voice, then he said, more loudly, "Hawkins tried to clean up his beard for the first time in donkey's years. He turned it yellow. Then he came down to the village and caught a bus, After that, he returned home, carefully stained his whiskers their former color and finished up by dying several hours after he was already dead. It's pure baloncy! Anderson's been drinking!"

"What, so early in the morning?"

Kelly objected. "Besides, others saw Old Josh."

"Then you'd better get the opinion of another medical man," growled Lanigan. He accelerated his car with savage determination, whizzed it down the road to where Keily's home bore the modest sign: POLICE. With a faint touch f sarcasm, he added, "Snoop around a bit and see if Old Whiskers has a twin brother who'll inherit."

Kelly winced, heaved his brawny form out of the ear. Then he noticed a familiar figure waiting by the gate. It was Art Calder, booking elerk at the local depot.

"What is it, Art?"

"The boys tell me you're asking questions about Old Josh," replied Art. "So I thought I'd better come down from the depot and say my piece." He blinked nervously, lieked his lips. "Josh caught the eight-fifty-five express for London. I spld him his ticket. I saw him get on the train."

Despite his middle age, Doctor Lanigan was a healthy, active man, He proved it by the way he stopped his engine and vaulted from the ear in one dexterous twist. He stood chest to chest with the uneasy Art, thrust forward an aggressive face.

"You are prepared to swear that it was Hawkins and no other?"

"Of course, Doc," Art assured. He fidgeted under his questioner's intent gaze. "I couldn't mistake that dodderer." Lanigan turned to Kelly. "You know Hawkins far better than I do. You positively identify that body as his?"

"I do," swore Kelly, certainty in his voice, and stuperaction on his face.

voice, and stuperaction on his face.

"Right!" Doctor Lanigan shoved thumbs into vest pockets, hunged his jaw and perend shewidy at his puzzled conpanions. "I admit my error. Kelly, I ton the morten examination. It's going me." He turned to Art. "And I want you to phone along the line to the terminst, tryin all intervening station, and find our whether any collector has taken that ticket you insuch."

"Sure," agreed Art. "It won't take long to get that information." "You'd better report this to county headquarters," the physician told Kelly. "Evidently this affair isn't as simple as it looks. None of us really know just what happened or how it happened." He looked from one to the other. "But to me it's mightly like murder."

"Ugh!" grunted Art Calder. He shuddered as he thought of a killer in his little office, with only the glass plate between them. He had pushed his hand through the hole in that glass. If death had classed his hand.

THE post morten was official and, as Lanigan had promised, very, very thorough, Old Josh had been electroeuted as efficiently as any condemned gangster. So had his dogs. They'd died in the night-two dogs first, Soldier later. Old Josh last-somewhere between one-thirty and two-thirty in the dark hours before the haunted dawn. They'd died beneath a funereal sky which had released no lightning, had done no more than spread its sable pall across the scene of agony. There the quartet had gasped their last and scented the air with their final burns, man and animals alike, in an oil-illuminated cottage a full seven miles from the nearest power lines.

It was impossible. Nevertheless, it had happened.

The dambfounded investigators had just reached the conclusion that, since all the signs were those of electrocution, there was no other possible diagnosis, didoite as that one might seem, when news came in about the ticket. It had been handed in at Euston Station by a well-groomed, prosperous looking individual, presumably a business man.

Ten minutes after the ticket had been surrendered a questing porter found a corpse. It was reposing in one corner of an empty coach. It seemed to be asleen, and blissfully unconscious of its own complete nakedness. The porter nudged the cadaver which promptly flopped over with all the horrible abandon of empty clay. By a most remarkable coincidence, it was that of a well-groomed, wellcared-for individual, presumably a business man. A twin, in fact, of the gentleman who had given up the ticket bought by the twin of Old Josh,

The twin of Old Josh was not on the train. Chief Inspector McKechnie was thinking about this mixture of twins as he sat at his desk in Scotland Yard and stared beneath bushy evebrows at Doctor Lanigan and Police Officer Kelly. The inspector was big and shrewd; he looked like a bull buffalo with no illusions.

"I'm glad you two came along so promptly. The evidence you've been able to give shows clearly that there is some extremely mysterious but quite definite connection between the death of Hawkins and the body found at Euston."

He paused, thought a moment, then went on. "The body on the train has been identified as that of Wilson C. Fairbrother, a broker of some prominence. He appears to have died by electrocution strange as that may seem."

"Ah!" exclaimed Lanigan.

"Something very cock-eyed links these two tragedies," McKechnic continued, He rested heavy elbows on his desk, propped his big jaw with ham-like fists, "Hawkins, by all accounts, got on that train but never got off it. Fairbrother's double got off it but we've failed to turn un any evidence that he ever got on it in the first place. So what?" They waited for him to tell them. "So the conclusion to be drawn is childishly obvious; the man who caught the train while cleverly impersonating Hawkins was one and the same individual as the man who left the train in the guise of Fairbrother." "But---" began Lanigan.

"Where is the motive?" said Mc-Kechnie, finishing the question for him. He spread his large, capable hands in a gesture of disgust. "There's the weak spot! Fairbrother was carrying little money, had no known enemies. And, according to you two, Hawkins was a harmless old cuss without a cent in the world. Added to which, I quite fail to see why any killer should choose to masquerade as his victims. It doesn't make sense."

"It's pointless," agreed Lanigan, "It's nutty," Kelly rumbled.

$70U'VE hit the nail right on the head?" Chief Inspector McKeehnie wagged an emphatic finger. "It's so crazy that that in itself is a lead. Until more satisfactory data comes in I'll make a rough guess that we're bedevilled by an insane actor, an unsuccessful individual who's overdue for the nuthouse, a would-be screen star with delusions of grandeur and a persecution complex."

"Somehow," put in Lanigan, doubtfully. "I can't imagine any make-up artist as supremely good as this one would have to be. Why, he was positively identified as Old Josh by folk who've known the old geezer for years. One of them was a small-holder to whom Josh had sold a dry cow, and out in the country you don't forget the man who sells you a big mouth and no milk. That's not mere acting ability-it's genius too good

"I can bardly believe it myself," Mc-to believe 2"

Keehnie retorted. "In fact I'll admit I've difficulty in converting myself to my own theory. But, at present, it appears to be the only one that'll fit the known facts. I'm wide open to receive a more plausible alternative."

"There isn't one, unless . . . unless . ."
Lanigan broke off, looked confused.
"Unless what?" McKechnie prompted.

"Nothing, really. I was toying with notions of the supernormal. It's too foolish to be worthy of consideration." Lanigan pondered gleomily, then spoke up with a note of sudden defiance that surprised himself. "The more I think of the whole affair, the more I'm convinced that we're facing something never before faced in the history of crime."

"I've faced some dawn funny things in my time," said McKechnie reflectively, "but all the lot of them proved astonishingly straightforward after 1'd traced them to the bitter end. Three times does it—1'll concede that I've got a hundinger in my mitts directly something just as whacky links up with these two jobs."

He didn't know it, of course, but item number three was on its way to him right then. It came from Bermondsey, running along wires, through telephone exchanges, into the switchboard of Scotland Yard, thence to his desk. His phone velled for attention.

McKechnic whisked up the phone, holding the earpiece as if it were an underweight dumb-bell. He rammed the thing against a big area of ear.

"Well? I'm busy—can't you deal with him. Oh, all right then, put him on." He sat for a moment, tapping his teeth with a silver pencil. "Yes, yes, go on, I'm listening." Then he uttered, "What?" several times, his voice rising one note higher each time. An expression of slow surprise crept into his normally phlegmatic features. Finally, he said, "I'd like you to come up right away. How soon? In about half an hour—good!"

Breathing heavily, he cradled the phone. He ignored the others, searched hurriedly through the deep litter of papers on his desk. In the end he found what he sought in the pocket of his raincoat, hanging in one corner. It was the morning paper. Spreading it over the mess on his desk, he seanned it eagerly.

"When you opined that we are facing something to tough to laugh off, you were a paragem of veracity and the holists of prophes;" he informed Lanigan. He jerked a beety finger at the poper, then at the phone. "We got hoper, then the proper, then at the phone, "We got his brother identified by running his picture in the morning papers. Now this chap rings up and says, "My marks' Onions, and it aim' funny!" After photo as that of a man who made news yesterday afternoon, a mere half-hour after that train drew in at Euston," "Made what news?" put in Kelly, curiously. Holding up the sheet, McKechnie which he says that he recognizes the Holding up the sheet, McKechnie pointed to a small paragraph headed: FIRE VICTIM VANISHES.

"The caller says he was one of the several witnerses. He's coming here to tell precisely what he saw." He permitted himself an unofficial grimace. "Tree a lousy idea that what Mr. Onions intends to tell us will clear up this case just like stirring a mud-bortomed pond!"

CHAPTER III

MR. ONIONS proved to be an emaciated individual with a straggling, black mustache and bat's ears. He had watery eyes that never looked with love on anything other than booze. His derby hat was decidedly cute, his attire had plenty of zoot and exused a faint smell of horse manure. McKechnie mentally classified him as a race-course tipster, a stable hanger-on or a bookie's tout.

"I was coming over Lambeth Bridge," reported the equine-colored Mr. Onions, "when I saw this stallion whose pieture's in the papers, He was trotting toward me, msking a good pace, and I wouldn't have noticed him particularly if it hadn't been for his eyes."

"What about his eyes?" encouraged McKechnic.

"So help me, they were awfull" said Mr. Onions fervently, "They made you feel as if all your insides were missing. Directly I noticed them I said to myself, "There's a fiend straight from the guts of Hell!"

The speaker didn't look capable of any thought so dramatically expressed, yet it was plain to see that he'd been considerably shaken. He eyed his listeners with the apprehensive air of a known liar who, for once, is voicing the gospel truth and doesn't expect to be believed.

"Directly I thought that to myself," Mr. Onions continued, "he stabbed me with a look I could feel. Then he bust into flames." He stopped, took a long breath, added, "Strike me dead if it ain't the truth!"

"And what then?"

"He flamed like a bale of hay. Half a dozen people came running. They were too late. There wasn't anything."

"What d'you mean, there wasn't anything?" prompted McKechnie.

"The flame just went, It puffed out.

Then there was nothing. We all searched around but couldn't find even a pants button. A cop came along and took all our names. He searched around too. He found nix."

"Go m."

Onions licked his lips, began to look desperate. "Last night a kid reporter called at my house. He put all the stuff down in his book, grinning while he did it. I hope he backs all the sitters! Then he left, saying he'd interview the other witnesses. So they stuck that bit about it in the paper."

"We're very much obliged to you, Mr. Onion," said McKechine, smoothly. He leaned back in his chair, let his speciative yes wander over the silent Lanigan and Kelly. Then he studied the illust-case. Onions. He continued the thoughtful and deliberate study so long that the subject began to floiget. Suddenly he said "Yee a firm idea that you've been holding something back. Don't be afraid still us—we won't haugh at you."

"It's crazy," protested Onions, not bothering to deny McKechnic's guess.

"My dear man, you couldn't recount anything crazier than the eases we're stuck with right now!"

SHUFFLING his feet around, Onions was half ashamed, half apologetic. He hesitated, pulled at one of his bat cars, met McKechnie's penetrating eyes, blinked his own uncertainly.
"It was only a delusion."

"Never mind—out with it."

"Well, just as this flame went out, I thought for a moment that it looked like the ghost of an old hayseed with a beard."

"Hah!" snapped McKechnie,

"But it was only my fancy, because it was a flame. Then, for a second ofter the flame went out, I thought I saw a big purple cabbage with squirming things like snakes sticking out from between its leaves." With astonishing bellicosity, Mr. Onions went red in the face and shouted. "See if you can believe that?"

"I do," McKechnie replied evenly.

Onions was dumfounded by this ready acceptance. He stared around with the bewildered air of one who finds such faith far more surprising than the story.

"Did the other witnesses see the

"No. I asked them. They thought I was drunk. But I was sober—cold sober." Then, in added justification, "I was much nearer than them. In fact there wasn't anything nearer than me except for a fool of a dog."

"A dog?" put in Lanigan. "Did you notice it before this iuciden thappened?" "Can't say I did," admitted Mr. Onions. "It was messing around my feet just afterward. It popped up in the general excitment, like dogs do."

"Thanks," approved McKechnie. He was about to add something more when a knock at the door silenced him. A uniformed policeman inserted his head and spoke in tones of mock solemnity.

"Inspector, a druggist out in Balham says he's caught a werewolf. It's got his poet's bones, and he wants to know what we're going to do about it."

"Werewolfe? Poct' bones?"

"Yes, sir."

MccKechnie's heavy frame shuddered from head to feet. He stood up slowly, stared at the now grinning cop, the gaping Onions, the puzzled Kelly, and the apparently day-dreaming Lanigan. Then he said, "Whien I get out of bed

I'm going to swear off late suppers."

He offered Kelly a hairy forearm.

"Pinch me."

Kelly pinched, McKechnie blinked and rubber the arm. His temper finally evaporated, and he roared at the cop in the doorway.

"Tell that guy in Balham we're on our way there. Get the car out."

"Yes sir." The other's grin vanished.

He gulped twice, departed dazedly.

"Werewolf!" said McKechnie insane-

ly. "Damn!"

Table druggist was one Georges Papagobus, a Greek, He lay prostrate in the room behind his small, unperceitious store. Perspiration beaded his plump, olive face which was being carefully famed by a buscom wench of strong resemblance to himself. He sat up as McKechnie's ephantism of the strong and McKechnie's ophantism of the strong and McKechnie's ophantism of the strong which was a strong a deep strong and McKechnie's ophantism of the strong McKechnie's ophantism
McKechnie's

"In da yard," announced Papazoglous, waving a fat and sweatly land, of find him in da yard. I abut da door, I bolt da door, I lock da door, An' then I phone the police." He lay down again. The girl resumed her faming, Papazoglous uttered a string of names of persons considered holy in the Levant.

"You kill him, my god, such quick!"

McKechnie considered the fateful door. Werewolf, bunkum! Fine fool he'd have looked, coming along with a stake, door, Werewolf, bunkum! Fine fool he'd have looked, coming along with a stake, a mallet, and the conventional bouquet of garlic. All that brought him, in fact, was a queasy feeling behind which lay that incident concerning the "fool of a dog." Maybe it was the same dog.

IT WAS the same dog. McKechnic didn't know that, of course, but his whim had not led him astray. So he stood there with a mere couple of inches of wood between him and that eeric something that was neither human nor divine, that alien invader who was Spiro the Spy. Instinct did not warn him that the deadliest peril on earth waited just beyond that door. Inwardly, he felt that he had been somewhat stupid in giving his personal attention to a futile happening that could have been investigated by the eop on the beat, But, having been stupid, he might as well be thorough about it.

With the uniformed driver of his car standing ready behind him, he unlocked, unbolted and opened the door. He went into the yard. It was a small, brickfloored vard holding a tumbledown fuelshed, half a dozen skeleton erates marked: Non-returnable, three old and very dirty carboys with the word: Acid faintly discernible through their grime, an ashcan stuffed with erumpled cardboard cartons, a greenish-black shrub-tub harboring a thing that looked like a weary eastor-oil plant, and, finally, a rusty, neglected bicycle, Nothing else,

McKechnie snorted loudly. said. "Well, where's your blasted dog?"

Springs creaked as Papazoglous heaved himself off his sofa. He appeared at the door, his eves wide and round. The eves searched the vard cautiously, apprehensively. They went wider and rounder. Nothing! It took half a minute for the sheer nothingness to sink in. Then Papazoglous began to wave his hands to the accompaniment of a veritable flood of words in his native language, Disgusted, McKechnic went in. pushing past the excited Greek.

"Sneak English," he said curtly,

"I finda man in my store," shouted Papazoglous, semaphoring frantically. "I eatch him pokin' aroun', lookin' at de bottles, bustin' up da packets, I come at him an' shout, 'Hey, you!' and he run like hell t'rough to yard, me after him. When I get to yard, 'he is a dog," He crossed himself, mopped perspiration. "Maria, I swear it! He is a dog - so!" He lowered a flat hand to show the animal's height, "Wit' eves like tiger, They burn. God, how they burn!"

"He's not there now."

"Doan' care. Was there when I phone! A werewolf; Christos yes! I lock door an' phone."

Pensively, Papazoglous gazed through the window at the silent undisturbed vard. The girl who had fanned him came through with a bucket of water, put it down while she opened the door to the yard.

"Helena," breathed Papazoglous, in a voice strangely low and tense, "from where have we got this plant in da vard?"

"Ain't no plant," contradicted Helena, "Helena, you got eyes, hah?"

"Ain't our plant anyway," declared the unruffled Helena. "Maybe somebody dumped it." To show her contempt for the subject under discussion she lifted her bucket, took aim, tried to douse the plant.

McKechnie shouted, "Great heavens!" Papazoglous' scream went skidding halfway down the street,

THE water sloshed out in a sloppy, glistening arc. It never reached the plant. It merely curved toward it, the motion of the liquid column appearing absurdly slow by contrast with the speed of the amazing reaction.

Like some dreadful djinn released from a bottle after one thousand brooding years, the plant writhed its leaves, contorted itself in mock agony, then shot up to a height of ten feet. Here, for a moment almost too brief to register ou the shocked vision of the onlookers, it poised and wavered in the form of a long, leering, caterpillarish thing of extreme horror and supreme obscenity. Next, it was a flaming snake twisting protesquely in mid-air a few feet above its former haunt. Even as the sluggish water splashed upon the now empty tub, the snake had elosed in upon itself, solidified hardened, become a large black cat with optics that were pools of extramundane hate

Displaying all the agility characteristic of the feline tribe, the big cat ran along the top of the wall on which it stood. turned once to sear the watchers with the atter evil of its stare, then dropped from sight. Its black tail vanished, and for an instant something spawned beyond that wall, a leafy, rich-hued object that might have belonged to a huge, purple cabbage. But that, too, went-a vision so brief that it might have been only the figment of a sickly dream.

The clatter of Helena's bucket was the final shock to nerves already stretched to the limit. Even the steel-hard McKechnie jumped. Her face a phastly white. Helena had flooped in the doorway, falling without a murmur, Mc-Kechnie picked her up, bore her indoors. Papazoglous was back on his sofa. He was incoherent, hysterical, and looked like a corpse. The driver who had brought McKechnic used a quarter of an hour and much sal volatile to get the Greek into talkative condition. "Now." demanded McKechnie, firmly, "where do the poet's bones come in?" "Da right finger bones of eternal Homer," moaned Papazoglous, dully, "So real, so true, what you call authentic, Mine family have them for centuries."

"That," declared McKechnie, contorting his face, "makes everything as plain as daylight. I see it all, now. It is a revelation to me." His voice went harsh. "What the devil have these tomfool relics of your to do with the matter?"

Papazoglous winced, pointed a trembling finger at an ornately decorated silver casket standing on the sideboard. "I put them in a place ver' safe, or so I t'ink. This man, he snatch da casket an' run. I chase. He drop it. I lock door, save bones, make call to you."

"So." said McKechnie. "he didn't know what the silver how contained Tie took it because it appeared to hold the most valuable item in the place, such as . . . such as . . . " "Such as which?" Papazoglous asked.

"I don't know." McKechnie's irefulness swiftly gave way to a morbid mood. "It's now obvious that we're trying to deal with something likely to have standards very different from ours, something with totally different notions of what is valuable and what is not. It might," he went on, with a touch of shoulish satisfaction, "think blood more precious than gold."

"Maria!" shouted Popazoglous, frantically. "Take me from this accursed place!" He lay back, rolled his eves until only the whites showed, sweated from every pore.

CHAPTER IV

THE bulbous-browed experts ended their profound argument, not be-their protound argument, no tecames the discussion was settled to the entire satisfaction of all, but for the theter and peculiarly British rearrows the was now time for the satisfaction of their based of the satisfaction of their based to the satisfaction of the satisfaction of the based of the satisfaction of the satisfaction of which the dispute inda raged, just asearfully placed them in a small but excedingly heavy set box, double looked the box, handed it to the pair of watchers at his side.

The two accycled their clurge as if it held the Crown lewels. They left the room, one cuddling the box in a beety embrace, the other fondling a lump of metal in his right-hand jacket pocket. Schemuly they paraded downstairs, descending several flores below relating saids an immense steele grille, permitted them to cuter. They crossed a small, metal-sheathed room, and stopped before the great, circular door of an underground value.

Producing a bunch of keys, the attendant selected four of them, inserted them in a certain order, twisted cach of them to a certain degree. After that, he spun dials and did other complicated things. All this took a full minute, during which the waiting pair stood bureed and silent. The attendant pressed a bidden button, a conceal mired the judy of the produced of the complex period of the produced of the comtained the produced of the protein the produced of the protein

Carrying the box through the steely maw, the escort unlocked one of a long row of metal compartments, slid the box inside and locked it up again. The compartment bore a label inscribed with a seemingly meaningless code; but in another building near to hand, similarly harred and botted from eurious eyes, was a code-book in which this label was registered opposite a brife entry; Thorsevi's Five Thousand Mite Alomic Rocket.

Still with rocklike pose and equal dumbness, the guardians watched the attendant lock the vault, re-set the dials, extract the keys, shut and secure the grille. Then, and only then, did they go, their thick-soled boots clumping along the passage towards the stairs.

At ten o'clock in the evening, a large balck cat slipped through a side door in the Ministry building, dodged a send-woman's map, sampered past the police guard at the nearer end of a long nasage, and simously evaded the gund at the other end. Like a sable shadow, mere, unheard, it padded through a room in which the former guardians of the loss were broedly perusing the evening papers. It reached the stairs, paused a mononet, stared with eyes that burned ferociously. Then it field down the stairs.

Behind the grille, the relief attendant was settling down with his book. Some weird instinct made him lift his eyes: he saw the big cat trotting daintly along the passage towards him, and thought of the lethal current flowing through the grille.

"Sssktz!" he hissed, dropping his book and trying to shoosh the animal away. The cat came nearer, "Scram!" he said, frantically, "You'll be burned to a cinder."

The cat took no notice. It reached the grille, hesitated, eved it calculatingly, then snaked easily through the bars. Upstairs, a fuse exploded with a bang that brought the lounging guards to their feet. But the attendant did not see the invading cat on his side of the grille. He saw it sliding through the voltageloaded bars, easily, unharmed, its flaring ontics like tiny windows in hell. Then the lights went out: the cat bulged, mixed and swirled in a veritable kaleidoscopic display of fantastic forms. It was a figure of indescribable horror when the strength went out of his legs and consciousness departed from his mind.

An old, old man pottered around in the gloom, a wrinkled gaffer with yellowbrown whiskers. He fiddled with the door of the vault, trying its dials and exploring its key-holes with strangely sensitive fingers that seemed to have ears at their ends. Once, he turned to the unconscious attendant, placed fingers on the man's forehead as if casually consulting the sleeping brain. Then he found the keys, inserted and turned them in the proper manner, turned the necessary dials and went through all the other functions in the correct way, Finally, he pressed the button. Nothing happened, The hidden dynamo refused to respond; the immense, air-tight door emitted no sounds, stirred not an inch.

At that point, one of the upstairs guards replaced the fuse, power returned, the lights sprang on. Another guard, following the prescribed routine, started down the stairs, his gun held slackly in one hand. He was yawning as he went. Fuses come and fuses go, but he'd go on forever.

The living dummy of Old Josh saw current rush back along the wires, gave the button another push. The door of the vault made its usual sounds and drifted open. He went inside, studied the steel compartments with an air suggesting that he could have looked them over just as easily in complete darkness. He was engrossed in the mysterious labels when the guard arrived.

PROAD-SHOULDERED and museu-

lar, the newcomer was a tough individual constitutionally incapable of wild excitement. Keeping clear of the grille, his hard eyes took one swift look at the supine attendant, the open vault, the Josh-like figure inside. Without batting an eyelid, without the slightest change of expression, he whipped up his heavy weapon and pulled the trigger. He did it with the slick motions and cool confidence of one who knows himself to be an excellent marksman. His bullets went blat-blat-blat, their echoes roaring throughout the confined space, thundering along the passage and racing up the stairs.

The missiles lanced through the body of the uncamy intruder, pinged off the walls of the walls. They might just as well have been pess. The target turned, stared at the narksmans, showed him a face from which the hairy fringe had vanished, a face—aye even a figure and reason that the narksmans of the start of the proposal business man. Of those of a processing the proposal business man. Of those of a processing the proposal business man. Of the proposal busines

"He looks like me!" His struggling fingers got home the second clip he'd been trying to shove into his gun. But he had time to let only two rip before a hellish blast swept through the grille, took him in its terrible embrace and frizzled his very soul.

Aroused by the uproar in the depths, a second guard came charging down the stairs, a uniformed policeman close upon

Both held weapons ready in their hands. At a noisy gallop, they took three bends, descended three flights, and on the fourth bend met the guard who had first gone down.

He was racing upward at a speed which vide with beir own. He passed them, gasped something they failed to catch, waved his weapon downward to indicate urgency, and continued full pet, up the stairs. The two carried on, managing to increase their speed by a fraction. Reaching the passage, they dashed along it, and found the body lying outtain the stair of the stair of the stair. It was also free wearing a queer flush, it sees rolled upward under the lifes, it was clay from which all life had gone.

"Gallaher!" oathed the plainclothesman, He gaped at his companion. "It's Gallaher!" His dazed gaze went around, found the attendant's sleeping form beyond the grille, the open door of the vault. "But damn it, we just passed Gallaher, on the tairs!"

At that moment, the man who wasn't gallaher strolled nonchalaulty along the street, stepped into a dark doorway, and looked up at the starlir sky. The object of his attention was a low-hanging orb fainty tinged with pink. What thoughts lingered within his brain—if he had a prain—or what sensations filled his being—if he had any real being—could not be told.

Passers-by noted, without suspicion, the shadowy watcher in the gloom. An automobile sped down the street, its headlamps momentarily easting his reflection upon an adjacent window. The reflection was not that of the dead Gallaher, but of a mere nonentity, one who, that morning, had rubbed shoulders with a camouflaged thing from the unexplored void, and had passed on, blissfully unaware.

AT THE stroke of midelight, he was in Batterea Power Station. An engineer discovered him walking silently along the diamond-materned steel plates of the overhead catwalk, passing now and thea to kan over the tubular siderails and peer at the banks of huge turbo-alternators. This picture of polished metal and of enominous power held in control seemed to fascinate the intruder. The engeer spat on his hands, picked up the useful steel handle of a tube-cutter, sprinted up the gangway and faced the interoper on the catwalls.

"What the blazes are you doing here?"
Aggressively, he poked the other in the middle with the length of steel. The metal made contact. A terrific shock flashed through its length, lifted the engimer off his feet, flopped him backward.
He went down like a bundle of rags, his face contorted with agony.

No ordinary individual could have absorbed that torrent of force and lived. Election engineers aren't ordinary Election engineers aren't ordinary strength and consciousness, feelily awar strength and consciousness, feelily awar electric eel in human slape. Aburdly enough, just as his brain was about to lapse into stumod sleep, he fancied that the eel looked more like an conormost flower, a lunge, fleshy lily of flaming crimson which bowed and waved over his body in mockery of life.

and the power station, to make the power station, to mitpowes on high airli stood casting, A big door eased agen, letting into the cold air of night a seed of lot her colder or night a seed of both eithers. Through the door came a cat, a dirty, mangy, wary thing typical of back alley vermin. It leered at them before it scutted into the night. The two watched it without interest. One swatched is cigarette. The other stared contemplatively into the darkness.

"Hey!" said the second, after a while, "That big door takes some shoving. How did that cat push it open?"

"Ever heard how rats steal eggs?" asked the other. He launched into a lecture on the subject of animal tricles, drawing plentifully upon his imagination. He conceived nothing resembling that damnable thing which had just slunk into anonymity.

"DOCTOR," said Chief Inspector McKechine, "I hate to believe it because it smacks of lurid literature. But I've got to hand it to you." He leaned forward, his chair squeaking under his bulk. "I'm forced to believe that your guess is dead right!"

"Let's go over the data again," suggested Doctor Lanigan, imperturbably. "All right." McKechnie lugged out a file and raked through the thick wad of papers it contained. "As you suggested, we got the cooperation of every leading news agency in the world. We asked them to give us as full details as possible of every reported incident that might come under the general headings of fantasite, supernatural or supernormal. Cutting out the resulting flood of spiritualistic stuff, and all the stunts of sensation seekers, we've plenty of interesting data left."

"In a mere couple of months," ob-

"In a mere couple of months," observed Lanigan.

"Yes, it's only a couple of months since Josh Hawkins became the first victim. Then Fairbrother. Whly was he stripped naked? Why did we find his clothes miles back along the line? Then that Greek—list case converted me more than anything. I saw what I saw?" He looked hard at Lanigan. "And when you've seen something like that you're ready to believe almost anything."

"You've missed out Onions."

"Yes. His story ought to mean plenty. Then there was that raid on the War Ministry's documents. They'd been look of at, but none were taken. Not one document missing!" He leafed through his papers. "Next, that incident in Battersea. Afterwards, nothing more until that report from France about the vanishing man who was found inspecting that the similar report of a strangely elusive spy in a certain aircraft factory. Later, the same uncapturable individual reaming around a famous armanent plant."

"The same entity," opined Lanigan, positively. "The times and movements all link up nicely,"

"Then thet fool story from Portugal about the trespasses in an observatory, the wouldn't or couldn't explain himself. His captor started to drag him to the police station and, when part way there, found himself leading a horse. He let igo," McKechnie permitted himself an amused snigger. "Things have gotten verve erazw when we have to admit that even that yarn might be true."

"Anything is possible," declared Lanigan.

"Now, apparently, he-or it-is back in England," McKeclinic turned over more papers, "Caught last Wednesday enjoying a private tour through the Daily Courier plant. The reporter who challenged him is still in hospital." Slapping down the papers, he made an expression of deep disgust. "Which means more insane antics to drive me mad Say your piece again-I like to hear my convictions made more convincing," "He's a Martian," obliged Lanigan, speaking very seriously, "Nothing known on this world of ours has such perfect power of miniery. His natural form might be anything. He's been seen masuerading as ten or more entirely different types of human beings, and as about six weird forms of life which obviously he is in the habit of imitating, but which are not native to this planet, I have a wild idea that he and his kind may have no such thing as a natural form of their own, and at every moment of their existence are imitating some form with which they are familiar, particularly those on which they prev."

"I'd like to see him mimic a corpsc." said McKeebnie.

"His uncanny but natural ability functions with such wonderful perfection," Lanigan continued, "that when he doubles as a human being his impression is perfect even to the clothes. He removed Fairbrother's attire and studied it for the sake of gaining perfection. He came very near to perfection at his first attempt, looking so like Hawkins that a close acquaintance saw only a slight difference in the color of the beard." "Co on "

"He arrived, as far as we can discover, 3--7 coincidentally with Mars' nearest approach to Earth, No other planet is in so favorable a position. Since then, Mars has been caining distance rapidly. If he leaves it much longer, it'll be too late for him to return. I think he's making ready for departure,"

"I agree," said McKechnie, his voice both reluctant and lugubrious. "What's turning my hair white is the problem of how to catch something that might be anything, and how to hang a man who's liable to turn into heaven-aloneknows-what while dangling in mid-air." Downstairs was waiting a reporter with something on his mind that might save the bothered McKechnie's hair. With the fatalistic patience of newspapermen, he sat waiting for his interview and pondered the strange case of the vaudeville star who really and truly could give the public exactly what they wanted,

CHAPTER V

THE pert, smartly tailored usherette conducted them to their seats, handed them a program apiece. Doctor Lanican bent forward, gazed intently over the balcony edge to the empty stage, in front of which musicians were tuning up. Violins made vague half-tones; an oboe chortled like a fat man laughing at he knew not what. The trap drummer vibrated his sticks in an experimental roll, then put them down and looked hored.

McKechnie twisted his burly form within his inadequate seating space, and surveyed with slightly bellicose gaze the portion of the audience to the rear. He spotted a pair of abnormally museular gentlemen squatting six rows back, favored them with a knowing nod. The recipients rewarded him with stares of disarming blankness.

orsaming bankness.
"I'm afraid that reporter sold us a pup," he grunted. He tried to cross his pillar-like legs, found that there wasn't enough space between the rows of scats, and looked at Lanigan as if it were his fault.

"We'll see," said Lanigan, philosophically.

Chapping announced the arrival of the conductor. The ordinestra broke into the Blaze Area with fire and cultubusians that contrasted strangely with their distincted expersions. They finished. A peroxide blonde took the stage. More Aleaping, The blonde samp Mylear Sample S

The turn ended, leaving some of the stabloders with pepped glands. Three Orientals came on, bowed deeply, peller by, with well-drilled precision. They jugged with chromium-plated steel hoops, After a while, they combined acrossic with the juggling. With a bowed fare well, they gave place to a second-rate connection. McKeeluine craned his neek to survey the pair of powerful persons sitting six rows behind him. They looked at him as if the were a pane of glass.

An hour later, the illuminated numbers placed on both sides of the stage glowed with the figure twelve. "Now!" breathed Lanigan.

The manager took the center of the stage. He had expensive dentures, a carnation, and much suavity.

"Ladies and gentlemen," he said, very smoothly, "as already amounced, Miss Mirsy is Morst, the Songbird of the South, is unable to appear tonight over ing to an indisposition. I am sure that we all sympathize with Miss is Monte in her temporary trouble." He paused, registered reverent sorrow. But, at cawith the switched to pleasure the particular of the white he switched to pleasure the particular of the particular and the particular which is a switched for your a single performance of the most remarkable exhibition ever to be shown upon the stage."

"Pfah!" snorted McKeelmie, shoving violently at the back of his scat without gaining a single inch. "A performance which has astounded

"A performance when has astounted the Confinent"—gestures of heavenly delight—"and now to be shown in this country for the first time!" Comporting himself with seemly nilen, the manager reached the wings, turned, waved a dramatic hand at the cupty stage. "Ladies and gentlemen," be said loudly,

"Ladies and gentlemen," he said loudly,
"we have great pleasure in introducing to you.—Spiro, the Master of Mystery!"
All the lights went out.

FEMININE spends salted this sudden plungs into deep darbness. For or seconds the stage was a silent area of deeper black within the general gloon.
Then, with starting swiftness, a column of peculiarly scintillating light sprang from the center of the stage, bent itself into a verified ring, whitele like a monster cutterine wheel. The trap furumer eartherine wheel spun, filledered, cents cated, then quickly flattened into debiacated, then quickly flattened into debialarity. The drum rolled londer.

The globe stood for a brief while, mysterious lights and shadows playing over its surface in baffling pursuit, Then the whole illumination sank into the subsurface, the globe contracted slightly and vanished to the accompaniment of a tremendous bang from the bass drum. The lights sprang up. The audience blinked at the stage.

Spiro, the Master of Mystery, stood poised on the stage at the precise point where his display of light-magic had poppel into nothingness. Cod, compose, the stood and studied his audience, his expression somewhat saturnine. He had the assurance and self-possession of an accomplished and famous theatrical performer.

A girl joined him from the wings: a slender, shapely girl attired in scanty, attractive uniform of the kind usually favored by illusionists' assistants. Two stage-hands brought on a folding cabinet, opened it out, turned it round and round to give a complete view of all its sides, then erected it.

subs, then ereceed in this open opera Doc Lanigan handed it his open opera plasses to McKechnic, saying, "Land heard of in Spain and Portugal, els?" heard of in Spain and Portugal, els? hook at the Mastery of Mystery, If a was a lean, handsone, sardonic face with olive skin, blue-black hair, jet-black eyes, the was a characteristic face, one that his astute mind had no difficulty in classifying.

"I see what you mean," he observed, shrewdly. "An Iberian type," Lanigan nodded silently. "Or maybe it's the girl," added McKechnie. He shi'ted the glasses, examined the girl's oval, delicate features, noting that she, too, was of Spanish type.

Forcing himself halfway round in his seat, he lowered a significant eyelid. The burly couple sitting farther back suddenly found nothing to detain them, left their seats, departed with the slightly sullen air of men who have yet to see something new. With grim determination, McKechnie got his legs crossed by half rising in his seat. The entire row shook when he flopped back.

On the stage, the girl assistant directed the attention of the audience to the cabinet. With impressive sangfroid, Spiro, the Master, walked into one side of the contraption and out the other side. Or was it the assistant who walked out? Deathly silence pervaded the theater while ouloukers stared in anazement at the two girls now occuping the stage. Identical twins, identically dressed.

Somebody said, "Whoo-oo!" and broke the spell. The audience roared its applause.

The magical twin curtseyed gracefully, strolled back through the cabinet. Spino emerged. The audience thundered. The stage-hands came back, pulled the eabinet to pieces in full view of the audience. Then they packed it falt and bors it off. They returned with a full-length mirror, stood it in the middle of the stage. Near it, they placed a brigidly plated, tubular frame supporting a curtain of black velvet.

CPIRO went behind the curtain, becoming lost to the direct view of the audience, but his ardroine reflection still visible in the long mirror. His girl assistant waved a small glass stick, nurmured some meaningless abracadabra in a low but audible voice. The reflection in the mirror dissolved, became a wild medley of blurred colors and shapes, then, with astounding rapidity, resolved itself into the mirrored image of a rose bush laden with large, hash blooms.

The audience bellowed approval. Mc-Kechnie fidgeted around like a man hardly able to wait for a time not yet ripe. Lanigan sat in brooding silence, his eyes straining toward the stage.

100

More abracadabra, more changes. A prickly eatts which swiftly sqlidified into an ornate Chinese vase and then, before astonishment had time fully register, just as swiftly came an Egyptian ewer of graceful design. A few more such demonstrations, hen Spiro came from behind the curtain, waited for the frenzied elapping to die down. He spoke for the first time, his voice share and recurretaine.

"The true explanation of these illusions is a very simple one. It is a discovery of my own which no other magicain and unplicate." His features set in a hard grin as he uttered that last word. "But I am now going to attempt a feat which I require your cooperation." Again the grin. "Under cover of darkness, I shall try to offer for your impection some miraculous reproductions of anything nominated by any member of the audience."

Somebody gasped, several clapped. Spiro bowed in mocking appreciation, and said, "Thank you?"

"Show me," challenged a skeptic in the stalls, "a ros's egg." The lights went out, came on. There was the egg—a huge one. "A giraffe," demanded another. Titters sounded in the following darkness. But he got his giraffe. The animal shuffled awkwardly on the stage, thrust its long neck high over the footlights, blinked at the audience. "Seen them in the zoo." whissered Lanigan. Pulling out his big, white handkerchief, McKechnie nodded understandingly.

The excited audience continued to call its choice, getting in return a fantastic series of impressions ranging from a pendant's demand for a Brazilian anteater to a humorous call for "a fivefoot eucumber." One ultra-rapid sample of mimicry was that of a famous political character in a typical pose. It brought deafening cheers.

deatening cheers.

McKetchnie blew his nose, flourishing his handkerchief discreetly. Downstain his handkerchief discreetly. Downstain in the left-hand asise, a gentleman whose jacket almost creaked aeross his shoulders saw the handkerchief out of one corner of his eye. He turned his attention to Spiro, placed hairy hands to his mostif and bull-bellowed a request that resounded all over the theater.

"Show we a Martian!"

The result was stupefying. Lanigan had expected that Spiro would retain his composure and ask the burly caller whether he'd recognize a Martian if he saw one. McKeehnie had anticipated being fobbed off with a grotesque initation of something that might be anything or, more probably, something that did not exist except in the alien invader's fertile mind.

fertile nindt.
What Spiro did do was to turn upon the burly baiter a face of such demoniacul harred that men quained and women screamed. His eyes became whirtpools of fring fire dredged from an unknown counts lold. They searce, and one could also that the his of their flaming, which have the his of their flaming, which have the size of the flaming of spirits and the size of the size of the long into the audience, and waded brough scricking propole toward that imperial Terrestrial who had dared to mention a Martian.

CHAPTER VI

BACK at the switchboard, the imperturbable electrician shifted his gum, plunged into blackness, its lowermost portion becoming a sultry pit from which arose a beldamic uproar of vells, screams and oaths.

His face crimson with excitement, Mc-Kechnie bawled a series of violent oaths. strove mightily to get his legs uncrossed. Nearly uprooting the seat in his frantic struggle, he did much to increase the panie of his immediate neighbors. The voices in the pit rose crescendo. With a final tremendous feat of acrobatics, he got himself unstuck, and plowed his way through the milling crowds, leaving behind his big, powerful form a wake wide enough to allow Lanigan to follow without discomfort. They reached the manager's office just as that worthy got to the switchboard and restored the lights. There were three policemen outside the office. McKeehnie said, "Let nobody in! Nobody! Not even the manager! Not even my twin brother!" They nodded.

Inside the office waited the pair of muscle-hound individuals who had been seated behind McKechnie and Lanigan at the time the show commenced. They had between them a dark-haired, slender, tearful and very frightened girl.

"I think she's safe enough," McKechnie remarked. "He's abandoned her, in view of what's happened." he seated himself by hooking a thick thigh over one corner of the desk. "Now talk-and talk fact "

"He picked me up in Lisbon," said the girl fearfully, and in excellent English. "He said I was attractive and could have a job as his assistant. I would travel much and see the world. He was going to put on his first, experimental show here before commencing his tour abroad." "Go on."

"He said he'd made a lifelong study of mass hynosis. He said that the Indian Rope Trick was not a real performance, but merely mass hypnosis, and that anyone perfecting the art could far surpass the world's most famous illusionists, performing more spectacular feats, more easily, with less bother. He claimed that he didn't need the complicated apparatus and expert trickery of ordinary magicians, and could get better results by sending his psycho-waves along the optical nerves of a crowd, making them see whatever he chose to depict as vividly and convincingly as if it were with their eves."

"Think there's anything in it?" asked McKechnie of Lanigan.

"I doubt it," responded the doctor, thoughtfully. "It is a very plausible explanation, and one well calculated to lull the girl's suspicians. But I've a hunch that his changes are real, physical ones."

"He was going to put on a show in Paris," the girl went on, "but it rained that night and he said he wouldn't go out. So he came to London. He visited Mitzy, and I think he bribed her to abandon one performance so that he could put on his show."

"Yes, a reporter told us about a few sample illusions he put over to clinch the booking." McKechnie turned to one of the guards. "What about you?"

"I dodged him in the general furor caused by the lights going out," answered the phlegmatic one, "Like you told me, I didn't bother about him, and concentrated on helping Bill to grab the girl and rush her here."

"Good." McKechnie approved. He turned an inquisitive eye upon Lanigan. "This was his last quest," declared

Lanigan, speaking very slowly, very deliberately, "I am doubtful about his alleged powers of mass hypnosis, but I thing his last job was to make a study of mass psychology. He revealed some of his abilities. Martian abilities, strange, extra-mundane talents the like of which don't exist in this world; and he got the human reaction to them-the reaction of humanity in the mob."

"Ah!" punctuated McKeclinie, with a grunt.

102

"He is sensitive to human reactions," Lanigan persisted, "Even the comparatively stupid Onions made him respond to suspicion. And he has a photographic mind." He studied his listeners, "That's why documents have been inspected but not taken away. Machines and apparatus have been examined but not drawn. He has gathered into his amazing intellect all the knowledge for which he came, ineluding that of how we alien, two-legged creatures behave in herds."

He jerked a thumb toward the ceiling. "Up there a planet is moving rapidly upon its appointed path. It waits for no man, no thing,"

"You mean he's about to beat it with all he's got?"

"I'm convinced of it!" Lanigan let his hands rest gently on the girl's shoulders. "My dear, did this person, this creature, tell you when and from where he would take you abroad?"

"Why, yes." Her pale-face went a shade paler, "He'd bired a private plane, We were going to Ireland, thence to America by Transatlantic Clipper." Her whisper was almost inaudible as she described the precise point of departure and the

"See," breathed Lanigan. "He even intended to take back a sample!"

RABBIT scuttled furtively across A the space surrounded by small, insignificant shrubs. It might or might not have been the very same rabbit which had received the fright of its life two months before.

Overhead, the sky was heavy, brooding, and the color of molten lead.

From his hidden vantage-point on the side of the hill, Doctor Lanigan peered through powerful binoculars at the little knoll that made a lump in the middle of the valley, His glasses swept slowly across the field of view, saw nothing. He might have been alone, far from all human life, but he knew that around the locality were half a hundred anxiously waiting men, some of them concealed within a few yards of his own refuge. Four hours of this, not to mention the long watch already put in by other patrols, lying and waiting for an event that might never come; silently, patiently, determinedly biding a culmination that perhaps was not to be. There were two and a half thousand million human beings in the world. There was one who wasn't human. And the defeat of an unimaginable menace rested solely upon the supposition that this one entity would appear at this one small spot within the limit of a certain time, On what a thin, fragile thread could human fate and progress be suspended!

All the same, Doctor Lanigan felt that this eerie, clusive foe would be compelled to risk the trap. He, the enemy, had a rendezvous with Mars, and willynilly must make the connection or remain isolated for a long time upon an awakened and hostile world. No planet could stand in its orbit even to save a faraway son. So, weary with the strain of waiting, but still full of confidence, Lanigan watched the valley and the knoll.

103

Half an hour late, a lonely figure wandered along the track toward the knoll. Its pace was indolent, careless, well calculated to disarm the suspicion of any concealed onlooker. At a range of a little over two hundreds yards, Lanigan scanned the stroller carefully. He saw a nondescript man of medium build, attired like a farm-hand. A sun-burned face was partly exposed beneath a cap. the large peak of which effectively concealed the eyes. Did those hidden optics have the dull, disinterested stare of an idle, innocent mind? Or were they secretly blazing with the feral hatred of a hunted werewolf?

ed werevolt?

Even as Lanigau vouleved, the cap titled when the vectore lifted his head,
titled when the vectore lifted his head, titled when the beautiful control of the control lifted has been as prepared as one like that concealed within the heart of a ruby which bears a prepental curse.
It was concip! Lanigau jogged a field telegraph key plug in the moss at his side. A mile higher up the valley, a ready hand turned a waiting wheel, floodgates opened in a concrete dam, an artitlesh labe poured outward in glad retitlesh labe poured outward in glad re-

Spiro saw the wall of water rushing madly toward him, the white horses of its foaming crest like an irresistible charge of liquid cavalry. He looked to the left, but there was the swiftly flowing stream that fed the little valley, its volume already swollen, its surface rising rajelly. He looked to the right, glaring ferociously toward the hidden onlookers. But the knoll was his only link with the emuire beyond the skies. He raced to the knoll, dashed madly up its slope. The raging waters surrounded the hillock just as he got clear. They swirled around its base, began swiftly to climb toward its crest.

The figure of the thing that was not an an changed as it fought up to the crest. It faded, lumped, distorted, he-case an upward-rolling ball obscenely clicialising tentacles. Then a glowing, firery python; then a humping caterupllarish monatrolity of fast and disgusting monitority of fast and disgusting of other fearful forms during and in between its many changes.

"GON," muttered Lanigan to himgolf, his eyes attaining at the rising and the go at the control of the transfer at the go at your long, long list of things to be hated. You fare water as you feer nothing clae in the whole of creation. There is little of it on Mars, and what little there is you'd rather be without—for it is death to you and your immaterial kind. All your explosits were in dry weather—I checked up, on that! You were unkneared on the wet days, You were unkneared on the wet days, for the control of the control of the fall backet. You abandomd your Paris show because it was raining."

The swirling tide was now lapping within three feet of the crest which the fugitive had reached. He was a python again. Even now he could escape, even now there was an absurdly easy means of evading his fate—if only he could of evading his fate—if only he could keep calm and think of it.

"Change as much as you like," said Lanigan in a tense whisper. His forehead was damp with excitement and anxiety. "You cannot be anything! You cannot be a fish. Nothing you can mune will save you, except, . . "He sweater durinosty in his framic effort or the furiously in his framic effort or hoperes the dangerous suggestion. What if that susceptible creature picked up his thought, and promptly took the easy way out? He was betting entirely on its psychology being similar to the human in one cogent respect—it could be betrayed by its own utter fear, could be made the victim of its own pain." You cannot except, unless. . "Again he had to fall the treacherous notion.

The flood lapped over the crest. With a sinusous motion, the form of sciulitating analisness escaped the watery grasp, floated momentarily a few feet above the surface. It writhed frantically in mid-air while far, far in the very depths of his mind Lanigna sensed to hear a wird, thereoughly abnormal assurration like a final wail of activated-matter before at vanished forever from the burned-out annual charge of the surface of the surface

Then the twirling, flaming shape fell back. It struck the hungry waters. They boiled and foamed as if they'd swallowed a one-ton lump of sodium. The opposite bill shivvered and quivered as Lanigan saw it through a column of released gases.

"Not true levitation," he said, "but temporary suspension. He made an ultra-slow jump! God, that I should have lived to see the like!"

Getting to his feet, he stared solemnly at the still violently disturbed waters, noting the wild, agitated bubbling as they continued to react viciously upon whatever was left of the thing that had no counterpart on Earth. McKechnie joined him, his ears filled with the termagant sounds and sizzlings from below. Even as they stood, something plumeted through the sky, plunged headlong into the water-filled valley. Optical retention left them with a vague impression of a strange, egg-like body builded of mist and random dreams. But it was real enough. It struck with a mighty splash, and the hungry waters reacted upon it ferociously.

"The mental connection was broken," observed Lanigan meditatively, "He had it parked"—he gestured toward the silent, aghast sky—"somewhere up there. He died—and down it came."

"Humph!" said McKechnie. He fondled his heavy gun, glanced over the now visible group of watchers, most of them armed. His expression was regretful. "I'd have liked to have taken a pos at him."

"Without effect," Lanigas pointed out "He's been shot at before, and a lot of good it did." He pondered a moment, looking to the north where, only a mile away, Josh Hawkins Ind let per a lonely vigil without avail. "We've learned a few useful things," I guess. We've learned, of instance, that Martinus are as esceptible to form a ourselvers. Note succeptible to form a ourselvers. Note the sucception of the second of the second of the unrecognisable and therefore unfoldercity Martinu types. Under extreme pressure of fear, his mind followed a well-besten track.

"I don't get the point," said McKechnic.

Lanigan smiled. "From what has happeated, we can make a safe bet that there are no birds on Mars. Filled with fear, his mind became entirely Martian, forgetting all its acquired Terrestrialism. Think—he could home here a bird!"

"Great heavens," rumbled the startled McKechnie, "So he could!"

Lizzie Borden Took An Axe...

BY HERBERT SCANLON

"Lizzie Borden took an axe
And gave her mother forty whacks

When she saw what she had done She gave her father forty-one."

EN say that horror comes at midnight, born of whispers out of dreams. But horror came to me at high noon, heralded only by the prosale jangling of a telephone.

I had been sitting in the small office

all morning, staring down the dusty road that led to the bills. It coiled and twisted before my aching e/ss as a shirmnering sun played tricks upon my vision. Nor were my eyes the only organs that betrayed me; something about the heat and the stillness seemed to invade my brain. I was restless, irritable, disturted by a vague presentiment.

The sharp clangor of the phone bell crystalized my apprehension in a single, strident note.

My palms dripped perspiration-patterns across the receiver. The phone was a warm, leaden weight against my ear. But the voice I heard was cold; icy cold, frozen with fear. The words congealed.

"Jim-come and help me!"

That was all. The receiver clicked before I could reply. The phone slid to the desk as I rose and ran to the door.

It was Anita's voice, of course.

It was Anita's voice that sent me speeding towards my car; sent me racing down that desolate, heat-riddled road toward the old house deep in the hills. Something had happened out there. Something was bound to happen, sooner or later. I'd known it, and now I cursed myself for not insisting on the sensible thing. Anita and I should have eloped weeks ago.

I should have had the courage to snatch her bodily away from this atmosphere of Faulkneresque melodrama, and I might have, if only I had been able to believe in it.

At the time it all seemed so improbable. Worse than that, it seemed unreal.

There are no legend-haunted houses looming on lonely hillsides. Yet Anita lived in one

There are no gaunt, fanatical old men who brood over black books; no "bex doctors" whose neighbors alum them in superstitious dread. Yet Anita's uncle, Gideon Godfrey, was such a man.

Young girls cannot be kept virtual prisoners in this day and age; they cannot be forbidden to leave the house, to love and marry the man of their choice. Yet Anita's uncle had her under lock and key, and our wedding was prohibited.

Yes, it was all sheer melodrama. The whole affair struck me as ridiculous when I thought about it; but when I was with Anita. I did not laugh.

When I heard Anita talk about her uncle, I almost believed; not that he had supernatural powers, but that he was eumningly, persistently attempting to drive her mad.

That's something you can understand, something evil, yet tangible.

There was a trust fund, and Gideon Godfrey was Anita's legal guardian. He re. had her out there in his rotting hulk ner of a house—completely at his mercy. It might easily occur to him to work on her imagination with wild stories and subtle confirmations. Anita told me. Told me of the locked rooms upstairs where the old man sat mumbling over the mouldering books he'd hidden away there. She told me of his feuds with farmers, his open boastings of the "hex" he put on cattle, the blights he claimed to visit upon crops.

Anita told me of her dreams, Something black came into her room at night. Something black and inchoate-a trailing mist that was nevertheless a definite and tangible presence. It had features, if not a face: a voice, if not a throat, It whispered. And as it whispered, it caressed her,

106

She would fight off the inky strands brushing her face and body; she would struggle to summon the scream which dispelled spectre and sleep simultaneously. Anita had a name for the black thing,

She called it an inculus

In ancient tracts on witchcraft, the incubus is mentioned-the dark demon that comes to women in the night. The black emissary of Satan the Tempter; the lustful shadow that rides the nightmare. I new of the incubus as a legend, Anita knew of it as a reality.

Anita grew thin and pale, I knew there was no magic concerned in her metamorphosis - confinement in that bleak old house was alchemy enough to work the change, That, plus the sadistically-inspired hintings of Gideon Godfrey, and the carefully calculated atmosphere of dread which resulted in the dreams. But I had been weak, I didn't exist,

After all, there was no real proof of Godfrey's machinations, and any attempt to bring issues to a head might easily result in a sanity hearing for Anita, rather than the old man, I felt that, given time, I would be able to make Anita come away with me voluntarily. And now, there was no time.

Something had happened. The car churned dust from the road as I turned in towards the tottering gambrels of the house on the hillside. Through the flickering heat of a midsummer afternoon, I peered at the ruined gables above the long porch.

I swung up the drive, shot the car past the barn and side-buildings, and parked hastily. " No figure appeared at the open windows, and no voice called a greeting as

I ran up the porch steps and paused before the open door. The hall within was dark. I entered heedless of knocking, and turned towards the parlor. Anita was standing there, waiting, on the far side of the room. Her red hair was disheveled about her shoulders; her face was pale-but she was obviously unharmed. Her eyes brightened when she saw mc.

"Jim-you're here!"

She held out her arms to me, and I moved across the room to embrace her.

As I moved, I stumbled over something. I looked down.

Lying at my feet was the body of Gideon Godfrey-the head split open and crushed to a bloody pulp-

THEN Anita was sobbing in my arms, and I was patting her shoulders and trying not to stare at the red horror on the floor

"Help me." she whispered, over and over again. "Help me?"

"Of course I'll help you," I murmured.
"But—what happened?"

"I dou't-know."

"You don't know?"

Something in my intonation sobered her. She straightened up, pulled away, and began dabbing at her eyes. Mean-and began dabbung at her eyes. Meanwhile she whispered on, hastily.

"It was hot this morning. I was out in the barn. I felt tired and dozed off in the havloft. Then, all at once, I woke up and came back into the house.

I found—him—lying here."

"There was no noise? Nobody around?" -

"Not a soul."

"You can see how he was killed," I said, "Only an axe could do such a job. But where is it?"

She averted her gaze, "The axe? I don't know. It should be beside the body, if somebody killed him."

I turned and started out of the room.

"Im—where are you going?"

"To call the police, naturally," I told her.

"No, you can't. Don't you see? If you call them now, they'll think I did it."

I could only nod. "That's right. It's a pretty flimsy story, isn't it, Anita? If we only had a weapon; fingerprints, or footsteps, some kind of elue..."

Anita sighed. I took her hand. "Try to remember," I said, softly. "You're sure you were out in the barn when this happened? Can't you remember more than that?"

"No, darling. It's all so confused, somehow. I was sleeping—I had one of my dreams—the black thing came—"

I shuddered. I knew how that statement affected me, and I could imagine the reaction of the police. She was quite mad, I was sure of it; and yet another thought struggled for realization. Somehow I had the feeling that I had lived through this moment before. Psuedomemory. Or had I heard of it, read of it?

Read of it? Yes, that was it!

"Try hard, now," I muttered. "Can't you reeall how it all began? Don't you know why you went out to the barn in the first place?"

"Yes. I think I can remember. I went out there for some fishing sinkers."

"Fishing sinkers? In the barn?"
Something elieked, after all, I stared Something elicked, after all. I stared at her with eyes as glassy as those of the eorpse on the floor.

"Listen to me," I said. "You're not Anita Loomis, You're—Lizzie Borden!"

Anna Loomis, You're—Lizzle Borden; She didn't say a word. Obviously the name had no meaning for her. But it was all coming back to me now; the old, old story, the unsolved mystery.

I guided her to the sofa, sat beside her. She didn't look at me. I didn't look at me. I didn't look at her. Neither of us looked at the thing on the floor. The heat shimmered all around us in the house of death as I whispered the story to her—the story of Lizzie Borden—

CHAPTER III

IT WAS early August of the year 1892. Fall River, Massachusetts lay gasping in the surge of a heat-wave.

The sun beat down upon the home of Fall River's leading citizen, the venerable Andrew Jackson Borden. Here the old man dwelt with his second wife, Mrs. Abby Borden; stepnother of the two girls, Emma and Lizzie Borden. The maid, Bridget "Maggie" Sulivan, completed the small household. A house guest, John V. Morse, was away at this time, visiting. Emma, the older Borden girl, was also absent.

Only the maid and Lizzie Borden were present on August 2nd, when Mr. and Mrs. Borden became ill. It was Lizzie who spread the news-she told her friend, Marion Russell, that she believed their milk had been poisoned.

But it was too hot to bother, too hot to think. Besides Lizzie's ideas weren't taken very seriously. At 32, the angular, unprepossessing younger daughter, was looked upon with mixed opinion by the members of the community. It was known that she was "cultured" and "refined"-she had travelled in Europe; she was a churchgoer, taught a class in a church mission, and enjoyed a reputation for "good work" as a member of the WCTU and similar organizations. Yet some folks thought her temperamental.

even eccentric. She had "notions." So the illness of the elder Bordens was duly noted and ascribed to natural causes; it was impossible to think about anything more important than the omnipresent heat, and the forthcoming Annual Picnic of the Fall River Police Department, scheduled for August 4th.

On the 4th the heat was unabated, but the picnic was in full swing by 11 o'clock -the time at which Andrew Jackson Borden left his downtown office and came home to relax on the parlor sofa-He slept fitfully in the noonday swelter.

Lizzie Borden came in from the barn a short while later and found her father asleep no longer.

Mr. Borden lay on the sofa, his head bashed in so that his features were unrecognizable. Lizzie Borden called the maid, "Maggie" Sullivan, who was resting in her room. She told her to run and fetch Dr. Bowen, a near neighbor. He was not at home.

Another neighbor, a Mrs. Churchill, happened by. Lizzie Borden greeted her at the door. "Someone has killed father," were Lizzio's morde

"And where is your mother?" Mrs.

Churchill asked. Lizzie Borden besitated. It was hard to think in all this heat. "Why-she's out. She received a note to go and help someone who is sick." Mrs. Churchill didn't hesitate. She marched to a public livery stable and summoned help. Soon a crowd of neighbors and friends gathered; police and doctors were in attendance. And in the midst of the growing confusion, it was Mrs. Churchill who went directly upstairs to the spare room. Mrs. Borden rested there, her head smashed in.

By the time Dr. Dolan, the coroner, arrived, questioning was already proceeding. The Chief of Police and several of his men were on hand, establishing the fact that there had been no attempt at robbery. They began to interrogate Lizzie.

Lizzie Borden said she was in the barn, cating pears and looking for fishing sinkers-hot as it was. She dozed off, was awakened by a muffled groan, and came into the house to investigate, There she had found her father's backed body. And that was all-

Now her story of a suspected poisoning was recalled, with fresh significance, A druggist said that a woman had indeed come into his shop several days before and attempted to procure some prussic acid-saying she needed it to kill the moths in her fur coat. She had been refused, and informed by the proprietor that she needed a doctor's prescription. The woman was identified, too-as Lizzie Borden.

Lizzie's story of the note summoning her mother away from the house now came in for scrutiny. No such note was ever discovered.

Meanwhile, the investigators were busy. In the cellar, they discovered a hatchet with a broken handle, It appeared to have been recently washed, then covered with ashes. Water and ashes conceal stains. . . . .

Shook, beat and embarrassment all played subtle parts in succeeding events. The petice presently withdrew without taking formal action, and the whole matter was held over, pending an inquest. After all, Andrew Jaekson Borden was a wealthy citizen, his daughter was a prominent and respectable woman, and no one wished to act hastily.

Days passed in a pall of heat and gossip behind sweaty palms. Lizzie's friend, Marion Russell, dropped in at the house three days after the crime and discovered Lizzie burning a dress.

Lizzie burning a dress.

"It was all covered with paint," Lizzie

Borden explained,
Marion Russell remembered that dress
—it was the one Lizzie Borden had worn on the day of the murders.

The inevitable inquest was held, with the inevitable verdict. Lizzie Borden was arrested and formally charged with the slayings.

The press took over. The church members defended Lizzie Borden. The sob-sisters made much of her. During the six months preceding the actual trial, the crime became internationally famous.

But nothing new was discovered.

During the thirteen days of the trial, the bewildering story was recounted without any sensational development. Why should a refined New England spinster suddenly kill her father and stremother with a hatchet, then boldly "discover" the bodies and summon the police? The prosecution was unable to give a satisfactory answer. On June 20th, 1893, Lizzie Borden was acquitted by a jury of her peers, after one hour of deliberation.

She retired to her home and lived a life of seclusion for many, many years. The stigma had been erased, but the mystery remained unsolved with her passing.

Only the grave little girls remained, skipping their ropes and solemnly chanting:

"Lizzie Borden took an axe
And gave her mother forty whacks
When she saw what she had done
She gave her father forty-one."

CHAPTER IV

THAT'S the story I told Anita—the story you can read wherever famous crimes are chronicled.

She listened without comment, but I could hear the sharp intake of breath as I recounted some singularly significant parallel. The hot day . . . the barn . . . the fishing sinkers . . a sudden sleep, a sudden awakening . . . the return to the house . . discovery of a body . . took an axe....

She waited until I had finished before speaking.

"Jim, why do you tell me this? It is your way of hinting that I—took an axe to my uncle?"

"I'm not hinting anything," I answered. "I was just struck by the amazing similarity of this case and the Lizzie Borden affair."

Borden affair."

"What do you think happened, Jim?
In the Lizzie Borden case, I mean."

"I don't know," J said slowly. "I was wondering if you had a theory."

Her opal eyes glinted in the shadowed room. "Couldn't it have been the same thing?" she whispered, "You know what I've told you about my dreams. About the incubus.

"Suppose Lizzie Borden had those dreams, too. Suppose an entity emerged from her sleeping brain; an entity that would take up an axe and kill-"

She sensed my protest and ignored it, "Uncle Gideon knew of such things, How the spirit descends upon you in sleep. Couldn't such a presence emerge into the world while she slept and kill her parents? Couldn't such a being creen into the house here while I slent and kill Uncle Gideon?"

I shook my head. "You know the answer I must give you," I said. "And you can guess what the police would say to that. Our only chance now, before calling them, is to find the murder weapon."

We went out into the hall together, and, hand in hand, we walked through the silent ovens that were the rooms of this old house. Everywhere was dust and desolation. The kitchen alone bore signs of recent occupancy-they had breakfasted there early in the day. Anita spid.

There was no axe or batchet to be found anywhere. It took courage to tackle the cellar. I was almost certain of what we must find, But Anita did not recoil, and we descended the dark stairwell. The cellar did not yield up a single sharp justrument. Then we were walking up the stairs to the second floor. The front bedroom was ransacked, then Anita's little room and at last we stood before the door of Gideon Godfrey's chamber.

"It's locked," I said. "That's funny." "No." Auita denturred. "He's always kept it locked. The key must be downstairs with-him."

"I'll get it." I said. And I did so, When I returned with the rusty key, Anita stood quaking in the hallway. "I won't go inside with you," she breathed. "I've never been inside his room, I'm afraid. He used to lock himself in and I'd hear sounds late at night

-he was praying, but not to God-" "Wait here, then," I said.

I unlocked the door, opened it, stepped across the threehold

CIDEON GODFREY may have been a madman himeslf. He may have been a cunning schemer, bent on deluding his niece. But in either case he did believe in sorcery. That much was evident from the contents of his room, I saw the books, saw the crudely drawn chalk circles on the floor; literally dozens of them, hastily obliterated and repeated endlessly. There were queer geometric configurations traced in blue chalk upon one of the walls, and candle-drippings covered walls and floor alike.

The beavy, fetid air held a fain, acrid reck of incense, I noted one sharp instrument in the room-a long silver knife lying on a side-table next to a pewter bowl. The knife seemed rusty and the rust was red. . . .

But it was not the murder weapon, that was certain. I was looking for an axe, and it wasn't here.

I joined Anita in the hall.

"Isn't there anywhere else?" I asked, "Another room?"

"Perhaps the barn," she suggested. "And we didn't really search in the parlor," I added. "Don't make me go in there again," Anita begged, "Not in the same room where he is. You look there and I'll go through the barn." We parted at the foot of the stairs,

She went out the side entrance and I walked back into the parlor.

I looked behind the chairs, under the sofa. I found nothing. It was hot in there; hot and quiet. My head began to ewim.

Heat - silence - and that grinning thing on the floor. I turned away, leaned against the mantel, and stared at my blood-shot eyes in the mirror.

All at once, I saw it, standing behind me, It was like a cloud-a black cloud, But it wasn't a cloud. It was a face, A face, covered by a black mask of wavering smoke; a mask that leared and pressed closer.

Through heat and silence it came, and I couldn't move. I stared at the swirling cloudy smoke that shrouded a face.

Then I heard something swish, and I turned. Anita was standing behind me.

As I grasped her wrists she screamed and fell. I could only stare down at her, stare down as the black cloud over her face disappeared, oozed into air. The search was over, I'd found the murder weapon, all right; it rested rigidly in her hands-the bloodstained axe!

CHAPTER V.

CARRIED Anita over to the sofa. She didn't move, and I made no attempt to revive her.

Then I went out into the hall, earrying the axe with me. No sense in taking any chances, I trusted Anita still, but not that thing-not that black mist, swirlliving brain and make it lust to kill, Demoniac possession it was; the legend spoken of in ancient books like those in the room of the dead wizard. I crossed the hall to the little study opposite the parlor. The wall telephone was here; I picked it up and rang the operator.

She got me the Highway Police headquarters. I don't know why I called them. rather than the sheriff. I was in a daze throughout the entire call. I stood there holding the axe in one hand, reporting the murder in a few words

Ouestions rose from the other end of the wire: I did not answer them.

"Come on out to the Godfrey place,"

I said. "There's been a killing." What else could I say?

What would we be telling the police. half an hour from now, when they arrived on the scene? They wouldn't believe the truthwouldn't believe that a demon could enter a human body and activate it as an instrument for murder. But I believed it now. I had seen the fiend peering out of Anita's face when she tried to sneak up behind me with the axe. I had seen the black smoke, the conjuration of a demon lusting for bloody death. Now I knew that it must have entered her as she slept; made her kill Gideon

Godfrey. Perhaps such a thing had happened to Lizzie Borden, Yes, The eccentric spinster with the over-active imagination. so carefully repressed; the eccentric spinster, sleeping in the barn on that hot summer day"Lizzie Borden took an axe

And gave her mother forty whacks"

112

And gave her mother forty whacks"

I leaned back, the verse running through my head.

It was hotter than I had believed possible, and the stillness hinted of approaching storm.

I groped for coolness, felt the cold axe-blade in my hand as I leaned the weapon across my lap. As long as I held on to this, we were safe. The fiend was foiled, now. Wherever that presence lurked, it must be raging, for it could not take possession.

Oh, that was madness! The heat was responsible, surely. Sunstroke caused Anita to kill her uncle. Sunstroke brought on her babblings about an incubus and dreams. Sunstroke impelled that sudden, murderous attack upon me before the mirror.

Sympathetic hallucination accounted for my image of a face veiled by a black mist. It had to be that way. The police would say so, doctors would say so.

"When she saw what she had done She gave her father forty-one."

Police. Doctors. Lizzie Borden. The heat. The cool axe. Forty whacks . . .

CHAPTER VI

THE first erash of thunder awakened me. For a moment I thought the police had arrived, then realized that the heat-storm was breaking. I blinked and rose from the armchair. Then I realized that something was missing. The axe no longer rested across my lap.

lap.

It wasn't on the floor. It wasn't visible anywhere. The axe had disappeared again!

"Anita," I gasped. I knew without conscious formulation of thought how it must have happened. She had awakened while I slept—come in here and stolen the axe from me.

What a fool I had been to sleep! I might have guessed it ... while she was unconscious, the lurking demon had another chance to gain possession. That was it; the demon had entered Anita arain.

I faced the door, stared at the floor, and saw my confirmation scrawled in a trail of red wetness dotting the carpet and outer hall,

It was blood. Fresh blood.
I rushed across the hall, re-entered the

I rushed across the hall, re-entered the parlor.

Then I gasped, but with relief. For Anita was still lying on the couch, just as I had left her. I wiped the sudden perspiration from my eyes and forehead, then stared again at the red pattern on the floor.

The trail of blood ended beside the couch, all right. But did it lead to the couch—or away from it?

couch—or away from it?

Thunder roared through the heat. A flicker of lightning seared the shadows of the room as I tried to puzzle it out.

What did it mean? It meant that perhaps Anita was not possessed of a demon now while she slept.

But I had slept, too.

Maybe—maybe the demon had come to me when I dezed off!

to me when I dozed off!

All at once, everything blurred. I was trying to remember. Where was the axe? Where could it possibly be, now! Then the lightning came again and with it the final confirmation—the revelation.

I saw the axe now, crystal-clear—the axe—buried to the hilt in the top of Anita's head!

FIND SOME NEW HORIZONS!

All the restless excitement of the untamed West lives in the pages of RANCH ROMANCES. Its stories can bring you yast new horizons of adventure.

Every issue contains seven or more action stories by the type of author we know you enjoy; writers like Frank C. Robertson, S. Omar Barker, Frank Gruber, Eric Howard, W. F. Hough and many others.

Get a copy of RANCH ROMANCES today at any good newsstand and you can bank on hours of satisfying reading and relaxation.

20c a copy. A new issue every month

IT'S GREAT To KNOW

YES, it's great to know that for only 10¢ you can qet 5 of the finest quality razor blades made. Thousands and thousands of men everywhere have been shaving with SHAMROCK Double-Edge Blades with great satisfaction.

SHAMROCK BLADES THE GOOD DUCK SHAVI

Shamrock Double-Edge RAZOR BLADES

5 BLADES 10¢

Know how pleasant shaving can be! Use SHAMROCK Double-Edge Blades.

SHAVE AND SAVE WITH SHAMROCK BLADES!